Mr. LOGAN. If we have reached the stage in our national life where we cannot trust our courts, where we cannot trust our Executive, and we cannot trust the Congress, of course, I should say that that is not revolution, that is oblivion, that is absolutely passing out of existence, simply because the people have no desire to resort to the court or to the Congress or to their Chief Executive. The Senator from Ohio, then, bases his entire argument that we are approaching a revolution upon the statement that he does not believe the courts are going to function; but we have, so far as the Supreme Court is concerned, in the main, the same Court that we have had for a quarter of a century. It functioned back in the good old Republican days, and nobody was afraid of the Court at that time. Why should the Senator from Ohio be afraid of the Court now? It is the same Court; it has the same Constitution, and it has all the powers that it ever had. Why should the Senator from Ohio be afraid of the Court that we have had so long?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator look with entire satisfaction, the lawmaking authority having been granted to this body, that it should delegate its authority to one man and thereby establish a government by one man rather than a government by law, as has been the case where we have authorized the antitrust laws to be suspended temporarily by the substitution of agreements entered into by interested parties, with the approval of the President, such agreements being regarded as fair trade practices, and becoming the law of the land, the violation of which is to be punished by a penalty assessed without trial in the courts of the land, but in accordance with the decree of the director as to whether the law has been violated or not? Is the Senator capable of looking with perfect complacency upon a movement such as that at the present time?

Mr. LOGAN. Let me say to the Senator from Ohio that whether I look upon it with complacency or whether I do not is entirely beside the question.

Mr. FESS. No.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Constitution gives the Congress the right to vest someone with such authority, then no one has any right or any reason to complain if the Congress does it. If the Congress did it under the mistaken belief that it had the power or the right to confer such authority, then there is the Court that can say we have no such authority. So no right has been taken away from any citizen. If no constitutional provision has been invaded, if the Court upholds such legislation, then it is just a difference of opinion as to whether it should have been enacted or not, but it is not a violation of the Constitution.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I do not think we are getting anywhere; we are arguing in a circle. The Senator says if the Congress has the right to do so-and-so, of course, then it should be done, and it should not be the subject of criticism and would be constitutional. Certainly if the Congress has the right to do this under the Constitution, then it would be constitutional. I claim, however, that the Congress has no right to delegate such power to an individual. The Senator evidently thinks it has, and it is merely a matter of opinion.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know; I do not say that. I think it has, perhaps, and that is my judgment about it; but, sitting in the capacity as I am at the present time, I do not have the final determination of whether Congress has that right, and neither does the Senator from Ohio. So we have no right to say that Congress does not have any such power. That is for the Supreme Court to determine; and unless the Supreme Court determines that Congress has done an unconstitutional act, then no one has any right to complain; and if it does so determine, no one has any right to complain, because the act is abrogated.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the Senator from Kentucky, who has long been a very eminent judge, if the able Senator from Ohio has not, in his consideration of very great matters, overlooked the fact that that against which he levels his complaint of some administrative body being given the right to announce a law in conformity with an act passed by Congress, and to enforce it, has been the fixed policy in the very lifetime of the very eminent Senator from Ohio? That point may be illustrated, first, by the action of Congress in giving to the Secretary of the Interior the power to sit in judgment on those who should violate the act of which we speak as the "oleomargarine law." Finding an individual offending, he may impose a penalty against him. Our courts have held that act valid and sustained it.

Second, has not the power been vested in the Secretary of Agriculture to sit in judgment of certain violations and to find individuals guilty and impose a penalty upon them; and has not that act been sustained by the Supreme Court?

Lately the most serious controversy our great administration has had with a great and respectable body of our citizenry has involved some of our soldiers, because of the power vested by the Congress in a board that has a right to hear questions of pension and take upon itself the judgment as to who shall be stricken from the rolls, or his property taken from him, so-called, and who shall be established there, and thus under such circumstance create an act and establish a judgment. Where, in the line of the precedents, is there any difference between these established precedents and the distinction brought forward by the able Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator very much for what he has said. He has expressed in elegant and intelligent language some of the ideas which I would have expressed if I could have done so as clearly.

Now, I wish to turn my attention for just a moment to the question of the delegation of authority. That is one of the questions which have been discussed by a number of Senators on the other side of the Chamber. The senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] delivered a rather impassioned speech on that question the other day. I wish to point out, if I can, for the RECORD, and for those who are interested enough to listen, the errors in what he had to say about the matter. Although he is a great lawyer, and, as said by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] the other day, he can always make his voice heard, because he is given wide publicity by the newspapers, I am going to say a few things about his speech, because, in my judgment, it is equally as unsound as the speech made by the Senator from Ohio about a revolution, and that is saying a good deal under present circumstances.

The Senator from Idaho undertook to show, if we vested the President of the United States with authority to promote trade and to regulate commerce with foreign nations, that that was a delegation of the taxing authority. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] and some of the other Senators have fallen into the same error. I might also say that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has followed them, and he has made some speeches along the same line, but if the senior Senator from Louisiana should ever find out what this legislation is about, he might really change his mind regarding it.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some of the provisions of the Constitution which make it very clear, in my judgment, that Congress is doing no unlawful thing when it delegates the power to the President of the United States to regulate commerce; and that is all we are doing by this proposed act. This is not a taxing measure; this is not a measure providing for the imposition of a tariff; but it is a measure providing for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, and it is nothing else.

The Constitution contains some very simple provisions that relate to this particular matter. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some of those provisions. They were mentioned in the speech of the Senator from Idaho the other day, but he completely omitted to enlarge on the one provision of the Constitution which is under serious consideration at this time.

If we turn to article I of the Constitution and examine section 8, we find this provision—and I want the Senate to follow me, because it is rather simple, if we will forget our flamboyant oratory and get right down to the simple language that is used in this simple document, the Constitution of the United States:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises—

For certain purposes.

I would remind some of the Senators, particularly the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], that for a long time it was argued by those who opposed the protective-tariff system that a protective tariff was illegal because there was no power in Congress and the power could not be found in the Constitution to protect industries; that the Congress could only lay taxes and duties to pay debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare, and that imposing a tariff so that individuals and industries might be protected was violative of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. That was argued much more extensively than even the question of the delegation of power to the President to impose tariffs has ever been argued by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator recall that the question of the power of imposing a protective tariff was argued under the general-welfare clause in the preamble to the Constitution as being a means to promote the general welfare, and that that gave the authority for the protective-tariff policy?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator is mistaken in suggesting that it came from the general-welfare provision in the preamble to the Constitution. I think it was taken from the general-welfare provision in the section which I just read, which allows the Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." It is true that the courts finally held that it had become a part of the settled policy of our Government to impose a tax to foster industry upon the idea that it was for the general welfare of the Republic; but I suppose everyone in America who ever gave thought to the matter knows it is not for the general welfare.

A protective tariff is for the special welfare of a particular group. But we had a revolution in our Government, exactly the kind of revolution I am talking about, and if the Senator wants a specific and concrete example I would say that when the courts approved the policy of imposing a tax under the general-welfare provision of the Constitution for the good of a special few, then we had a revolution and the courts changed what apparently had been the plain meaning of the Constitution of the United States.

But I must get back to what I started to say. The first power which Congress has which we are to consider at this time is embodied in the first paragraph of section 8 of article I, which is what I have just read, the power to lay taxes.

There is another power of equal dignity, of equal importance, in the same section, which, I believe, is the third paragraph, and which confers upon the Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

Then, not in this particular grant of power but under the authority conferred upon the Chief Executive, there is the power to make treaties, subject to the approval or the ratification of the Senate.

Then we have under consideration in the pending bill three constitutional provisions. Perhaps they blend; perhaps there is a twilight zone which separates the one from the other; but there are three great points in the Constitution which we must consider in connection with the bill. One of them is whether we are delegating to the President the power to lay taxes. I say no; that that is merely an incidental power, which is not the purpose of the bill.

The purpose of the bill is to empower the President or to delegate to the President the authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations. That is what we are trying to do. We are not trying to delegate the power to the President to make treaties under the other provision of the Constitution, but we are delegating to him the authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

In doing these things we say that he should use the taxing authority which Congress has as an instrumentality to bring about a regulation of commerce with foreign nations.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] the other day in discussing these matters mentioned the authority to tax, which he said we were delegating. He mentioned the authority to make treaties which he said we were delegating. But he only incidentally referred to and passed over without comment the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, which we are proposing to do by the provisions of this bill.

Let us see what the difference is. A treaty, of course, must be ratified by the Senate. An agreement to regulate commerce does not have to be ratified by the Senate. Do we not have—and I ask this question because I do not know—postal conventions and regulations with foreign governments? The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is Chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, would know about it. We work out agreements with foreign nations for the carrying of the mails, and about postal rates, do we not?

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, if it be contended that when we make an agreement with some other nation to regulate any matter of business between the two nations such an agreement is a treaty, I say we have been making such postal agreements since the foundation of the Government down to the present time, and nobody ever thought to assert they were treaties.

It may be that in the event of an agreement made by the President with another nation to regulate commerce, Congress would have a right to revoke it by enacting a law denying the authority. But if he should make a treaty, which undoubtedly he could do if he desired, and that treaty should be ratified by the Senate, of course we could not revoke it.

Let us see a little further about the powers of the Congress to regulate commerce. I want to get that in the minds of those who are interested in the question. Read the last paragraph of section 8 of article I of the Constitution. The power to regulate commerce with foreign nations is clearly one of the powers vested in the Congress. Do we have any right to enact any law or laws which are necessary to carry out that power which is vested in the Congress? Let us see if we do:

> Congress shall have power * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

When power was given to the Congress by the States to regulate commerce with foreign nations they did not stop there, but said that we should have the full power to enact any law that Congress might deem necessary in furtherance of the regulation of commerce with foreign nations. Congress has determined or is getting ready to determine that we need to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Congress has the right to determine how it may be done, and, in view of the fact that Congress cannot do it itself, it has a right to select its own agency through which the regulation of commerce with foreign nations shall be brought about.

That is in the Constitution. Is that revolution?

Mr. FESS rose.

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio, if that is his desire.

Mr. FESS. Where in the Constitution does the Senator find authority for the President to regulate commerce?

Mr. LOGAN. I am trying my best to tell the Senator. We find it first in the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations expressed in one of the enumerated powers in section 8. The closing paragraph of section 8 provides that Congress shall make all laws which shall be necessary and proper, and that means that Congress, in its judgment, may enact any law it deems necessary to regulate commerce with foreign nations. If the Congress shall determine that the President of the United States or the Senator from Ohio himself, or any other agency which the Congress may see fit, is the proper one to regulate commerce with foreign nations, then the Constitution itself says that Congress has the power to enact the law.

May I say to the Senator from Ohio that that is exactly the point which the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] confronted the other day. He argued at great length and with much force that the Field case did not hold that Congress could vest the President with power to make rates, and he argued that point rather successfully, I thought. But there is one thing, may I say to the Senator from Ohio, which the Field case does hold—and no one can escape the conclusion that the opinion of the Court in the Field case holds that the President of the United States may have power delegated to him to regulate commerce, because Congress placed in him the power to deny the importation of certain articles upon certain conditions that might arise. The Supreme Court of the United States held that Congress properly vested that authority in the President of the United States and that it was purely the regulation of commerce which was invested in the President in that case.

So I might say, in answer to the Senator's question, that I find the authority not only in the plain provisions of the Constitution of the United States but also in the decision of the Supreme Court in the case to which I have referred, interpreting and construing the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I yield further to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I have great admiration for the judgment of the distinguished judge from Kentucky, but I admit that he is jarring somewhat my admiration for his judgment unless I have entirely failed to get his premises.

I understand that article I of the Constitution deals with the Legislature, and states expressly what powers the legislative branch shall have. Article II of the Constitution deals with the Executive, and states the authority the Executive shall have. Article III of the Constitution deals with the judiciary, and nothing especially is said about the other two. I cannot understand, however, how the Senator from Kentucky, in reading article I, specifically stating that Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce, can carry that over into article II and say that that means that the Executive may do it.

The Senator knows that the body of the Constitution is a delegation of power by the people. It gives certain powers to the Congress and certain powers to the Executive. I cannot understand how the Senator can read into article II powers that are not granted there.

Article IV of the Constitution deals with limitations upon the Congress and upon the States. An instrument, such as the Constitution, which enumerates the powers that are delegated by the people, places limitations upon this body as well as grants powers to it. In reading the provision in article I that Congress has the power to regulate commerce, how can the Senator ascribe that power to article II, which deals with the President and gives him no such power? I cannot understand the reasoning of the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Ohio is making an argument against the well-established decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; but, so that the Senator may never again be mistaken about the power of Congress on this particular subject, let us epitomize the section and leave out everything except the essential parts under discussion, which read in this manner:

> The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations * * * and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers.

Then, if Congress has the power to regulate, it must provide the means of regulation, and it has the power to provide the means of regulation. It has the power to say who shall carry out the edict of Congress; who shall do what Congress may suggest shall be done. If it desires to say that the President, or a tariff board, or some other board, shall carry out its edict, the authority is abundant in article I, giving Congress specific power to do the very thing which the Senator from Ohio says it cannot do.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, right there Congress has the power to say how its edict shall be carried out. That is the statement of the Senator?

Mr. LOGAN. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. Congress has the power to regulate commerce. The Senator takes the view that the Congress, having that power, can delegate it over to the Executive, thereby abdicating its authority. It has not given any edict to the President. It has given the President ipse dixit power to do as he pleases, upon his own initiative. Is that equivalent to the President having power under article II?

Mr. LOGAN. Congress did that back in the days when the Senator from Ohio was having much to do with legislation. Congress did do something of this kind, and the Supreme Court of the United States said Congress had the right to do it. When Congress said, "We will not presume to impose a tariff on certain articles that are coming into the country free, but we will delegate to the President of the United States the power to say whether or not these articles shall come into the country free", we gave the President authority to regulate commerce with foreign countries; and when the President asserted that power the Supreme Court of the United States said Congress had a right to delegate that power to him.

If the Senator from Ohio can get away from that plain proposition as to the provisions of the Constitution, and the distinction of the Supreme Court, he is an abler lawyer than I am. That is what the Court said, and that is what the Constitution says.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask one more question, and then I shall not interrupt the Senator any more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky further yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LOGAN. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. FESS. The delegation of power which is involved in the pending bill, and which the Senator says is not a violation of the Constitution, would carry with it, as I interpret the argument of the Senator, that since Congress has the power to regulate commerce it can delegate that power to the President. Since Congress has the power to lay and collect taxes, it can delegate that power to the President. Since Congress has the power to regulate customs duties, it can delegate that power to the President. In other words, all the powers that this body has could be delegated to the President, and we could adjourn and go home and be better off.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. The Senator again has fallen into very serious error.

The other day when the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was discussing the power to lay taxes and the power to make treaties, and avoiding any reference to, or any discussion, I might say, of the power to regulate commerce, he made an attack upon the opinion in the case of Field against Clark, and said that it was not the power to lay taxes that was delegated to the President in that case; and perhaps he was right. I rather think he was right about it. He was wrong about almost everything else he said, in my judgment, but in that I think he was right. Then Congress had delegated to the President the right to do something. What was it? To regulate commerce; and that is all it had done. So the Senator from Idaho seemed to reason out, although he did not say it in so many words, that the Supreme Court upheld the power of the President to regulate commerce with foreign nations; and if that opinion means anything, that is exactly what it means, as I understand.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Did I understand the Senator from Kentucky to say that the Senator from Idaho did not refer to the question of the regulation of commerce?

Mr. LOGAN. I changed that and said that he did not discuss the question of the regulation of commerce. The Senator from Idaho dwelt very eloquently on the power to lay taxes, and said we could not delegate that power; and he dwelt on the power to make treaties, and said we could not delegate that power. As I recall his words, however, he did not say anything about the power to regulate commerce, more than to refer to it very briefly as one of the powers to be found in the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. I did not discuss it at great length, but I did say that, in my judgment, this bill had for its object and purpose the regulation of commerce, and that that was a matter which belonged exclusively to the Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator made that statement, then his reasoning about the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Field case must be wrong; and I think he was right, because that is all that was done in the Field case.

Congress, as I recall, delegated to the President of the United States the power to say whether certain goods should come into this country free. That, of course, was a regulation of commerce. The power of the President to do this thing was attacked in the courts, and the Supreme Court said he did have the power. The Senator from Idaho said the Supreme Court so held because the power vested in the President was not the taxing power. If it was not the taxing power, it was the power to regulate commerce; and being the power to regulate commerce, the Supreme Court upheld the delegation of such authority in the case of Field against Clark.

Mr. BORAH. The Supreme Court upheld the law in the case of Field against Clark exclusively upon the proposition that Congress did not delegate to the President any power to lay taxes; that it did not delegate any power to regulate commerce; that the sole delegation to the President was the ascertainment of a fact and the announcement of that fact, but when that fact was ascertained and the announcement made, the law which Congress had passed went into effect; that Congress had legislated, the law was complete. The Court laid particular stress upon the fact that the sole function of the President was to ascertain a fact and to announce it. That has been accepted as a power of legislative bodies, of course, from the beginning of the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. The fact which the President was to ascertain was whether he should take certain action in the regulation of commerce with foreign countries.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Congress regulated the commerce by fixing the rates which should obtain both before and after the fact was announced. The sole thing which devolved upon the President was to ascertain a fact; to wit, whether other countries were levying a duty which was nonreciprocal.

Mr. LOGAN. And then what did the President do after he had ascertained that fact?

Mr. BORAH. After he had ascertained that fact, he announced that fact, and the act itself provided what rates should prevail after the fact was announced.

Mr. LOGAN. Then that was a delegation to the President of the power to say whether certain goods should come into this Nation free or should be dutiable, as provided by the Congress. The power to regulate interstate commerce unquestionably was delegated by that legislation, else the President could not have done anything.

Mr. BORAH. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator at length. I will simply state my position and then desist.

Mr. LOGAN. That is all right; I do not mind being interrupted.

Mr. BORAH. What I understand from that case is that the President was not given power to say whether certain goods should come into this country or not. Congress said that; and the Congress, in its legislative act, operated upon the single proposition of the ascertainment of the fact. That fact the President was permitted to ascertain; but after he ascertained the fact as to what goods should come in, the terms on which they should come in and the rate at which they should come in were fixed by the Congress itself in the act. The Supreme Court said that by reason of the fact that Congress itself had determined the rate and the conditions upon which the goods might come in and go out, that was not legislation upon the part of the President.

Mr. LOGAN. But it was a delegation relating to the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, and the President was vested with power which affected commerce with foreign nations.

Mr. President, a few weeks ago the Senator from Idaho made a great speech. The Senator is a great lawyer, and in sorrowing over the rights of the people which have been taken from them by Congress he grew very eloquent. He gave us a powerful burst of eloquence on the rights of the people. As I have undertaken to show to the Senator from Ohio, there is no Member of the Senate and no Member of the Congress who can put his finger on any act anywhere that has taken any fundamental constitutional right from the people of the United States.

I wish to call attention to some of the things which I think the Senator was in error about when he discussed the bill. The Senator's whole discussion was aimed at the taxing power of Congress, and that is not the subject of the bill pending before us. It is a bill to regulate commerce with foreign nations. The Senator said:

> It seems to me the bill runs counter to the plain provisions of the Constitution. I, therefore, beg the indulgence of my colleagues while I discuss the bill in the light of these constitutional provisions.

What I complain about is that the Senator then did discuss the power to tax, he did discuss the power to make treaties, but he did not discuss the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and that is the subject of the bill.

To show that he was discussing the taxing power, let me read what he then said:

> There is no subject in which the people have or could have a greater interest than that of where the taxing power of government should rest and how and under what circumstances it may be exercised.

I quote that from the Senator's speech simply to show that beyond all question the only thing he had in mind was the delegation of taxing power. That is not such a terrible thing, when we come to think about it. Taxing power is delegated by every legislative body that passes any tax law. Let us take the income tax law. We passed a law saying the rates should be so much. But who is it who determines the amount of the tax that shall be paid? Who is it who determines what is exempt and what is not exempt? It is the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and the amount of the tax is finally ascertained by some one to whom Congress has delegated the power to determine what the tax shall be.

Let us consider the plain, old-fashioned general property tax. Real estate has always been taxed, I suppose, and we impose taxes upon it. The legislature of a State passes a law imposing a tax rate of so many mills or so many cents, according to the value of the property, and states that the property shall be assessed at 100 percent of its market value, we will say. Then the legislature delegates to the tax assessors, or to the tax commissioners, or to a board, the power to determine what is the 100-percent value, what is the value of the property, and it is the assessed value of the property which determines the amount of the taxes which shall be paid. There is no tax law of a general nature of which I know which does not delegate authority to lay taxes. We cannot function as a Government without the delegation of power.

In this connection I wish to make another statement. Someone has said that parliamentary government is a thing of the past. That is not true. But parliamentary government, as we knew it in the beginning of our own Nation and as it has been understood for many years in England and other countries which have parliamentary governments, has finally discovered that there must be modifications, that there must be changes, or that parliamentary government must perish from the earth.

A while ago I mentioned the fact that the fathers of our country, who wrote the Declaration of Independence and established the Constitution, never saw a railroad train, never saw a reaper or a mower or a tractor, never saw a steam engine, never saw a railroad or any kind of a street car or an electric light, never talked on a telephone or heard of such a thing, never rode in an automobile or an airplane, never dreamed of such a thing as a radio. So these great questions have arisen since parliamentary government was instituted among men.

Then what are we to do? Are we to abandon parliamentary government? We would have that to do if we undertook to say that the Congress, or that the legislature, or that parliament must go into the details with every bill it passes so as to determine exactly how it should be administered. Yet that is parliamentary government.

Parliamentary government would have said, when we passed the bill for the relief of the distressed and appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars, "Congress must provide exactly how it shall be determined whether relief shall be administered to a particular unfortunate, exactly what officer shall administer relief. It must determine exactly what board and what people and what persons shall have control of the relief."

We could not have done that at all. We would have been here even now discussing the questions which would have arisen. But parliamentary government, as it was understood in the old days, meant that we should do exactly that thing. So we must get away from that. Parliamentary government must be modified to the extent that the parliament must have the authority and the power to delegate the details to someone else, because parliament as a body cannot work out the details and put the end to any law.

It means simply this, that the Congress of the United States must chart the course, it must determine the objective, it must determine the policies which the Government should follow, and write them into laws. That is all we can do in this day and age. We are forced, then, by the very circumstances and conditions to delegate authority to someone to put into effect the purposes which Congress has determined should be accomplished for the happiness of the people of the Nation.

If we had undertaken a little more than a year ago to pass a law regulating banks, and to provide how they should be opened, we would have been talking here yet if we had undertaken to say exactly what steps had to be taken before a bank should be opened or before a bank should be closed. Yet that is parliamentary government in its pristine purity, that is parliamentary government, perhaps, as it was understood in the beginning of our Republic; but it is not parliamentary government under the present-day civilization.

So I say that when we undertake to regulate some great business, such as banking, we have to delegate the authority to someone else. We do not leave them to do as they please. we set before them a goal, we place before them a flag flying high so that they may see it, and we say, "You must travel the path that leads you there, but we cannot determine every step you shall take or how you shall take it." So parliamentary government as it exists today means that we must delegate authority if we are to accomplish anything.

I presume there is no one here who would be bold enough to say that Congress could write a tariff law. The last one Congress enacted was perhaps the most horrific monstrosity the world has ever seen, and it brought upon us all of the troubles we have, though we may now try to get away from it and explain it away. Some Democrats, as well as Republicans, seem to be afraid of questions relating to the tariff. But I must pass on. I content myself by saying that the Congress has the power to delegate to the President of the United States the power, as the agent of the Congress, to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

Mr. President, I am not going to read the opinions referred to by the distinguished Senator from Idaho, but I want to say now that I agree with him most fully that an emergency does not have anything to do with constitutional provisions. We cannot set aside constitutional provisions because of an emergency. It would be foolish to make such a contention as that. It is in the time of emergency when we must stick closer to our Constitution and constitutional provisions. There is, however, one thing I should like to suggest. There are powers in the Constitution and there are authorities given the Congress by the Constitution which do not need to be exercised until an emergency arises; but when an emergency does arise, if we want to do something which we have not done before, we must find the authority in the Constitution. If we cannot find the authority there, then, of course, we should not take the action. I am persuaded, however, that every time we have had a crisis, every time we have had a calamity in our country, the people have been able, through the interpretation of the Constitution by the courts—and no other body has the right to interpret it under our laws—to find authority in the Constitution to meet emergencies; not because we develop anything new, but merely because we awaken a sleeping power which there was no need to exercise except when an emergency arose.

I think it has been necessary on several occasions for the people to amend their Constitution in order that the Federal Government might have more authority than it has ever had; but in every emergency we have had during our national life the people have had the power or have found the power, either in the Constitution already existing or by writing new provisions into the Constitution, to meet the emergency.

I do not think any of us would say that the Constitution of the United States is made of cast iron; that there is no resiliency to it; that it cannot be expanded to meet an emergency, if the emergency is contemplated by any provision of the Constitution. It is not a dead thing. The Constitution of the United States is a living force; and when the courts can find authority for acts of Congress and uphold them, no one has the right to say that Congress is violating the rights of the people in the enactment of laws which the courts uphold.

I note the quotation from the Minnesota case which was put into the RECORD by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] expressed the opinion that the decision in the Minnesota case is an indication that our courts are apt to break down. I have practiced law a long time; I have seen courts render opinions which I thought were very unsound. They seemed so to me at the time they were rendered. Perhaps I have lost cases which I thought I should have won; but sometimes I go back to the old opinions which I thought were so wrong, and when I read them again I do not wonder at the opinion of the court, but I wonder why I myself ever held such a position as I did at the time the opinion was rendered.

We sometimes mislead ourselves. I know that the executive branches of government are often swept off their feet by the passions and the prejudices of the people. I know that legislative branches of government are often influenced by the clamor of the public. I have never seen a time, however, and I do not believe that I shall ever see the time in the history of our country when the judicial rights of the people have been or will be seriously affected, if at all, by public clamor; and I do not believe that there is now any more danger of the Supreme Court of the United States or the other United States courts, or our State courts departing from constitutional government and constitutional provisions, than there has ever been at any other time in the history of our Nation.

I trust the courts. I am willing to trust them. The American people are willing to trust the courts unless their confidence is undermined by the statements of great men holding high places, willing to say that they are afraid every constitutional guarantee will be swept aside because the courts cannot be depended upon. I believe it is unfortunate, I believe it is unfair, to make such statements as that, and I know it is harmful to the people, who are distressed, and hardly know where to look for succor. Therefore I disagree with the Senator from Ohio when he says that the Minnesota case shows that perhaps the courts are becoming impregnated, as it were, with the idea of a "new deal" or a "new day." I do not think so. I am not afraid of the courts.

I desire to find the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] about a case which he said he thought much of. I shall not discuss the Hampton case which he mentioned. The Senator said he disagreed with the court in its decision in that case. I think perhaps I should have disagreed with it at the time; but it is the law. The court has so decided.

Here is the case I had in mind; and to show the Senate that the Senator from Idaho sometimes answers himself, I desire to read from it. He was quoting from a case and he said that it was a case of which he was very fond. Let us see what there is in that case to sustain his argument that the liberties of the people were being destroyed, when I am persuaded that he must have known that not a single right guaranteed to any individual in America has been destroyed by any legislation, nor, indeed, can it be until we overturn our Government.

The Senator from Idaho read from the Milligan case, and he said he is very fond of it. I am, too. I agree with the Senator fully. Let us see, however, what the court said is found in the Constitution; and if we find that the court thinks that we can find salvation in the Constitution on an occasion like this, it seems to me the Senator from Idaho should be willing to concede that the Constitution does afford a remedy in times like these.

The court in that case said:

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people—

That is right—

equally in war and in peace—

and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances.

I wonder if the Senator from Idaho thinks the Constitution has been a shield to all classes of men during the past few years.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not quite hear the reference to the Senator from Idaho. The Senator said he wondered if the Senator from Idaho did what?

Mr. LOGAN. I said I wondered if the Senator from Idaho thinks that the rights of all classes of people have been protected by the Constitution of the United States in the past few years.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I made no charge that the people of the United States had not been protected in that speech. I was discussing the constitutional question alone. I have taken the position that the Constitution is sufficient and efficient under all circumstances and all conditions to protect the people of the United States and that it is not necessary to go outside the Constitution in order to do that.

Mr. LOGAN. I am fully in accord with the Senator's position.

Mr. BORAH. That is the position I have ever taken.

Mr. LOGAN. I am in full accord with that. But the Senator said, as I recall, that in the case of an emergency such as this the Government had no greater power than it had when there is not an emergency. I think that is true to a large extent.

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President; that is not what I said.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to be corrected if I am wrong in my statement.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Kentucky misunderstood the Senator from Idaho. What I said was that, whether it was an emergency or normal times, we must still go to the Constitution to find whatever power we should exercise here. I have claimed that, as the Senator said a few minutes ago, an emergency makes no change in the Constitution. That if we are going to exercise some extraordinary power, still we must find that extraordinary power within the terms of the Constitution. In all circumstances we must find our power in the Constitution adopted by the people.

Mr. LOGAN. I continue to read the quotation from the Milligan case:

No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of Government.

That is the Milligan case, and that is sound.

Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government—for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence.

And note this—

If all the powers are in the Constitution to preserve the existence of this Nation, it is time we were finding them. We have been hearing in the past 3 or 4 years of millions of men tramping the streets begging for work, while millions of pale-faced mothers stay at home and have to listen to their children cry for bread. Today there are millions of people who are hungry, millions who are naked, and millions who have not the place to lay their heads when night comes. It is such a condition as that which has been brought about through the abuse, perhaps, of the taxing power, or through the abuse in the imposition of what many choose to call a protective tariff. If such a condition exists, is not the Nation itself in danger? If it is in danger, if there is something that needs to be done to preserve the very existence of the Nation, the Supreme Court of the United States in the case which the Senator from Idaho said he loved so well, or was so fond of, said that there is in the Constitution the power and the authority for the Congress and the officials of Government to do the things that are necessary to preserve the existence of the Nation; and I agree fully with that.

Now a great noise goes up because it is proposed at this time to delegate to the President of the United States the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. The reasons why it should be done have been discussed by many. We have seen our foreign trade shrink almost into nothingness. There was a time when millions of people—I think Mr. Hoover on one occasion estimated the number to be 3,000,000 men, laborers—were given work in factories producing goods which were exported and sold to foreign countries; but that business has dwindled away until it is almost nothing.

We carry on practically no commerce with other nations, and when we undertake to devise some means whereby we may restore commerce with foreign nations, we hear it said, "You must not do it; it is a delegation of authority; it is the creation of a dictator; it is bringing about a revolution; it is destroying the sacred rights of some of the people who have grown rich in taking that from the average man which they had no right to take."

Mr. President, I have discussed the constitutional provisions of the pending bill rather hurriedly and unskillfully. I now wish to say just a few more words and I will have finished. What I say now expresses my personal views about a protective tariff; I speak for no one else. I do not know what the views of the President of the United States are; I do not know what the views of many of the Senators are; but I do believe as sincerely as I ever believed anything in my life that all the troubles we have today are but the culmination of that system which started 100 years ago and which has developed since then of protecting industry. The excuses that have been given for it have been lame ones. There never was any excuse for it other than to give power to some group of people somewhere to take from the great masses of the people that which they had no right to take. I am against the protective tariff. I realize it has become so a part of our system of government that we cannot dispense with it all at once, but if I had the power I would begin now and I would work toward the one objective of eliminating from our statute books everything that carries the idea of a protective tariff.

If there had never been such a thing as a protective tariff, there would not today be the great congestion of population and wealth in certain centers that has been brought out through the protective tariff. Why is it the farmers of the West are having such a terrible time existing? Oh, it is easy to answer that question. The farmers of the West have been discriminated against by a tariff which they themselves have supported.

The greatest propaganda the world has ever seen has gone out in favor of what we know as the protective tariff. Men who have great talent and great brain power have been hired by those who are its direct beneficiaries to go on every lecture platform and on every Chautauqua platform, the theaters, the picture shows—yes, even at times the churches themselves have been but the instruments of propaganda to create a sentiment for the protective tariff. If there had never been a protective tariff, factories would have developed naturally where the raw material was; they would have developed because of the necessity for their development; the money which has been taken from the people to enrich a few easterners and some others who have lately been getting benefits from the protective tariff would have remained with the people; and the population would not have been congested in New York, Chicago, Detroit, and other great centers, but the population would have been distributed throughout the West, where it belongs. If that had been true, instead of the farmers of the West being compelled to build and support railroads, as they have done in order to ship their raw materials to the centers of population where they could feed the people, they would have kept those raw products there, where the people would have been; and when they kept them there where the people should have been, they would not have been forced to pay freight rates to the eastern seaboard and freight rates again back on the finished product.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. In view of the Senator's position and his statement that he does not believe in the protective tariff, I wish to inquire whether he agrees with the recent action of the President in imposing a tariff, as I recall, of 150 percent on rugs?

Mr. LOGAN. Of course I do not.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In view of the Senator's position that ultimately he would eliminate all tariffs, may I ask him whether he thinks the pending bill is a step in that direction?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not; I am afraid it may result in higher tariffs. I am not much in favor of this bill because I am afraid that it is not a step in the right direction, but it is the only thing we can do. If there has ever been a piece of legislation that has wrought destruction to an already troubled world it was the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill.

Let me say in that connection that Senators on the other side of the Chamber are making a good deal of complaint about delegating authority to the President of the United States to make tariffs, if that is what they desire to call it, but I never heard any of them complain when they delegated the authority to Joe Grundy, of Pennsylvania, to make the tariff law of 1930. I would rather trust—and I think the American people prefer to trust—the President of the United States rather than Mr. Grundy, however good he may be.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I inquire whether the Senator would be in favor of repealing the present tariff law entirely?

Mr. LOGAN. The Smoot-Hawley tariff?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. If it were left to me, I would burn it in fire and brimstone.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am wondering whether the Senator can state why the Democratic Party has taken no action in that direction?

Mr. LOGAN. I am very glad to state that. For a number of years the Republican Party fostered the protective tariff, and it conferred benefits upon particular industries in which the Republicans were interested. The Democrats walked around on the outside for a long time and said, "We are against that thing; we are not going to stand for it"; but they were never able to do very much about it. Finally someone said, "Well, while the getting is good let us get ours." Take the tariff on sugar. If there ever was an iniquity on earth it is the tariff on sugar.

The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is not here, but some of the other Senators from sugar-producing States are present; and I think that is a good illustration. It was said, "We will build up a sugar industry if you will allow us to tax 124,000,000 people $250,000,000 in order to give to 500,000 people a bonus or a benefit, and we will be very well satisfied with a tax on sugar." That is what they have been doing. The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has often boasted of his friendship for the poor; great tears roll down his cheeks copiously when he talks about the poor; and yet if there is any tax in the world that is continuously and forever reaching into the pockets of the poor and taking their hard-earned pennies, assessing the men who cannot earn enough to afford shelter and food for their families, it is the sugar tax, which makes them pay per capita just as much as does Henry Ford or any other millionaire. That is true, in a large measure, as to all the items in a protective tariff. It does but one thing; it taxes the poor equally with the rich.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. Will the Senator point out any country in the world where sugar is selling cheaper than it is selling in the United States of America?

Mr. LOGAN. I will not, because I do not know whether there is any, but I do know, as every man knows, that if the tariff on sugar did not increase the price to the consumer in America there would be no tariff there. I do not care what it sells for in other countries of the world, the fact that the price is increased to the American consumer is what makes it an abomination. Senators are entitled to their own opinions about it. For those who believe that the United States Government should treat the tariff as a sort of grab-bag and that every fellow should reach into it and get exactly what he can, that is all right, if they believe it is all right; but, so far as I am concerned, I am against any such system.

I say that it is one of the great mistakes under the Government of the United States that for years the tariff has been used as a logrolling device, so says the Senator from Louisiana, whereby each one could get what he wanted, but there has seldom been anyone representing the great masses of the people. Nearly all the people are hurt by a protective tariff, for the price they have to pay for their goods and necessities is increased by the tariff. All the other Democratic Senators may depart from that view, if they so desire, and Democratic platforms may depart from it, and Democratic candidates, as was pointed out yesterday by some Senator, may depart from that idea; but as for me and my house forever, I declare that there is no one who can convince me that it is right to make 95 percent of the people pay toward the support of a very small minority.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wonder if the Senator can find any justification for the theory that we are entitled to put a tariff upon rugs coming from Japan, where the rate of wages is probably 15 to 18 cents a day as compared with $5 to $6 a day in this country?

Mr. LOGAN. I would not have missed that suggestion of the Senator from Delaware for anything. I was forgetting something I had desired to note. I hear people talk about the standard of living in America and the standard of living in other countries, and they want to even up conditions with a protective tariff. If there has ever been anything that is foolish it is that.

Go over to England, about which Senators talk. Go out in the country there and see how many little tumble-down cabins are to be found scattered on the mountainsides and along the streams. See if there may be found men and women and hound dogs that appear as though they had not had anything to eat for months. They are not to be found there. Their living conditions are better than our living conditions, although our workmen may receive a vastly greater wage.

Go into Germany, if we will, and drive through Germany and see the neat little houses where the working people live, with flowers climbing over the windows and on the roofs, the neatly trimmed lawns, and evidences of happiness everywhere. Then go to the mountains of North Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and other sections of the United States and see the living conditions there. Go into the throngs of the great cities of the United States, and then go into the cities of Europe, and come back here and dare to tell me it is necessary that we shall have a protective tariff in order to make living conditions here equal to living conditions in Europe.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. The Senator from Kentucky is speaking about England and about a tariff on sugar. I should like to have him to advise me if it is not a fact that in England there is not only a tax levied, but also a bounty paid for the growing of sugar and the production of sugar?

Mr. LOGAN. I would not dispute that at all; but I do not care if it be true. There may be a bounty paid and a tariff in every country on earth, but when we have a few sugar growers in Louisiana and other States who are filching the pockets of the people of the United States day in and day out, taking away the earnings of the poor, about whom our friends cry so much, I am against it because it is not right. We have less than 500,000 people in the United States interested in the sugar industry at all. We have nearly 125,000,000 people taxed for the support of that group. What is the justification for it?

The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] told us the other day, when he said—

> We wanted that tariff for our State, and so we went over and traded with somebody in Ohio for them to give us a tariff on sugar and the right to take from the people that which we had no right to take, if we would vote to give them the right to take something else from the people.

The Senator from Louisiana said he knows that is the way the tariff laws have been made. Bad as it may be to delegate the power to the President, I would delegate it to anyone, I would delegate it to Satan himself, before I would be willing to go through the processes which have been so ably described here by the senior Senator from Louisiana in the making of tariff laws, when he knows and we all know, that it is merely a filching from the people of the United States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REYNOLDS in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the senior Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I wonder if the Senator knows that if the tariff philosophy which he is expounding were put into effect we would not have a coal mine in the United States, because foreign coal would take the market; we would not have a domestic oil field in the United States, because foreign oil would take the market; we would not have any sugar production in the United States, because foreign sugar would take the market; we would not have any lumber production, because foreign lumber would take that market over. We would have nothing if the tariff philosophy my friend is advocating were put into effect.

Mr. LOGAN. But the people who burn coal would be able to buy it somewhat cheaper, and they need every penny they can save. The people who buy gasoline would be able to buy it much cheaper, and the people who buy sugar would be able to buy it much cheaper. There is enough land in the United States to support a population five times that which we have today.

I am objecting to the regimentation about which our friends talk so much—not the regimentation about which Professor Tugwell talks. I am talking about the protective-tariff regimentation where great groups of people have been brought together. Let me say to the Senator from Louisiana that he has been vociferously urging the distribution of wealth, and yet he boasts of the fact that he is one Senator who on every occasion has voted to perpetuate the system whereby wealth shall always abound in the hands of the few and the poor shall have nothing.

The only reason why we have these great aggregations of wealth in the main—I do not say there are not some exceptions—but the reason why we have the tremendous wealthy influence, the reason why we have the tremendous aggregations of wealth, is because of the pernicious protective-tariff system which the Senator from Louisiana says he advocates. Therefore, I must say that his advocacy of the poor is but a pretense because when he comes to act he acts for the rich and in favor of making them ever richer and greater in wealth. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wonder if my friend from Kentucky knows that in his effort to take the tariff off sugar he is an ally of the American Sugar Refining Co.?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not care whose ally I may be. I do not care whether I may be an ally of the sugar-refining company or whether it be Germany or the United States or Africa, I am for taking the tariff off sugar. When Secretary Wallace said it was a foolish thing to foster, if he did say it, he was telling the truth. But I am not speaking for him.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the junior Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield; but I did not mean to get into a controversy with the two Senators from Louisiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERTON. In order to avoid interrupting the Senator from Kentucky unduly, I should like to ask him two questions: First, whether he entertains the same view with respect to a tariff duty on tobacco and tobacco products that he does with reference to a tariff on sugar?

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly.

Mr. OVERTON. The second question is whether he has any information at all that in the event the bill shall be passed there will be a reduction in the tariff duties on sugar or on tobacco?

Mr. LOGAN. I hope there will be, but I have no information of the subject at all. I have not seen the President in months, nor have I had any information on the subject.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the senior Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I just want to try to ask my friend a question, and I am going to put it all in one question. Does he not know that the Copper Trust is against the copper tax, the Oil Trust is against the oil tax, the Sugar Trust is against the sugar tax, and does my friend from Kentucky still think he is not fighting the common people when he lines up with those trusts? They know what they are doing better than we know. The Copper Trust knows what it is doing, and so does the Oil Trust, and so does the Sugar Trust. But we people from Louisiana, whose farmers are raising sugar to keep soul and body together in this country, sugar that all must have, are opposed by these gigantic combinations and monopolies. The great trouble is that they steal our misguided friends in Kentucky away from us because they do not see where the lines are drawn.

Mr. LOGAN. I suppose the Senator does not make that statement seriously. I suppose it is for public consumption in order to defend the position he has taken since he has been in Congress that he is a friend of the poor and believes in the redistribution of wealth. Of course, no trust that ever existed is against a protective tariff unless, perchance, it could get more out of it by being against it.

I very well know that if we take the tariff off sugar, the consumer, the little hungry children about whom the Senator cries so much, the poor, pale women who rarely ever have a quarter to buy a quarter's worth of sugar, will pay less for their sugar, that sugar will be cheaper to them; and that is a good way to redistribute wealth.

Mr. VANDENBERG, Mr. FESS, Mr. LONG, and Mr. OVERTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield first to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the only time in 20 years when sugar has sold for more than 5 or 6 cents a pound was in 1920, when it sold up to 30 cents a pound; and that is the only year when the domestic sugar production ceased to exist and went out of the competitive market. Therefore, based upon the American experience, the moment the domestic-sugar competition ceases—and the Senator admits that it can exist only under tariff protection—our market is delivered exclusively to the Wall Street control of Cuban sugar; and the masses of people concerning whom the Senator is righteously worrying—and I agree with him in his solicitude—are the victims, not of the tariff but of the lack of domestic competition which is maintained by the tariff.

Mr. LOGAN. If the statement of the Senator is true—and I think it is; so far as I know, his statements are always true as he sees them—then there is a reason why the pending bill should be passed, and we should delegate to somebody the authority to break up a thing of that kind. We do not need a protective tariff to do it, but somebody should have authority to prevent that condition.

I think—and I am saying this seriously—that if I were writing this bill, I should write this kind of a measure: It would be about three or four lines in length. I should say:

The importation of all goods into the United States is hereby prohibited.

Then I should put in another sentence, saying:

Provided, however, That if any other nation shall work out an agreement with the Government of the United States which is satisfactory to both governments, then goods such as are agreed upon may be imported into the United States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Does not the Senator know that the United States has the cheapest sugar market in the world?

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know about that. I assume that what the Senator says about it is true. I do know that it has the only market in the world, so far as I am advised, where the people are taxed on the very necessaries of life. We might just as well tax salt; we might just as well tax those things without which the body cannot exist.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Louisiana is, of course, familiar with the fact that in the countries where the price of sugar is higher than in the United States, sugar is a monopoly of the government, as salt is in some uncivilized countries, as tobacco is in some countries, as cigarettes are in some countries, where an additional tax, over and above everything else, is put on the product for the purpose of government monopoly.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator from Missouri for his statement. I did not know about that. There are a great many things that I do not know.

Mr. LONG. I have not looked at the market lately, but I think it probably will be found that the price of sugar in Cuba today is higher than it is in the United States.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who is better informed than the Senator from Louisiana, shakes his head, so I guess that is not true.

Mr. LONG. Perhaps not; it may not be today; but I know that on many occasions the sugar market in Cuba has been higher than in America. All over the world, unless it is in Cuba, America has the cheapest price.

To show how much sounder that is than the Senator would think, in the tropical countries which produce the foreign oil that comes in here so cheaply that it ruins the American market, gasoline always sells for about twice what it sells for here, notwithstanding that they are the home of the cheap oil. America, by keeping up its domestic oil production, keeps down the price of oil. If we should today get rid of the domestic sugar crop in the United States, we would not have any more 5-cent sugar. We would not have any 6-cent sugar. We would have what we had in 1920, 30-cent sugar, or something like that.

Who owns Cuba? The National City Bank and Wall Street own Cuba. They own the Philippine sugar business, and we are driving countless millions of little farmers out of a living.

Mr. LOGAN. Did the Senator say, "countless millions"? Oh, no; there are very few farmers engaged in the sugar industry. Let us not have statements about "countless millions."

Mr. LONG. Not countless millions, but there are millions of people engaged in the sugar business. Perhaps there are not millions of farmers.

Mr. LOGAN. No; there are less than 500,000 all told, including employees.

Mr. LONG. The Senator means there are that many families. Count four to the family, every one of them working in the fields. Every one of them, from the time he is 6 years old, works in the cane fields. If there are 500,000 farmers, there are 2,000,000 men, women, and children in the cane fields and on the beet farms today. If today we drive the American people to a monopoly for sugar, if we drive them to a monopoly for oil, or to a monopoly for copper, the foreign producers can charge us what they want to charge us; and where are the people of America going to get anything with which to buy sugar if they cannot make any lumber, if they cannot make any gasoline, if they cannot refine any sugar? Where are the people going to get all the money with which to buy these products?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to point out to the Senator from Louisiana that Puerto Rico is a part of the United States. It is one of our possessions. It has no oil wells, and it has no tariff on oil coming from the United States to Puerto Rico proper; yet the price of gasoline and oil in Puerto Rico is from 25 to 60 percent higher than it is in continental United States.

The obvious reason is that there are less cars in Puerto Rico than there are in the United States, and therefore the evaporation and handling and transportation add greatly to the cost, while in the United States, where there is a great volume of sales, the transportation has been simplified and economized, and the volume is sufficient to prevent evaporation.

If, therefore, there prevails in a part of the United States a condition of high price of oil comparable to that in the South American countries which the Senator pictures, his argument must fall, because there is no support of fact under it.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. The Senator from Louisiana complains that a South American country producing oil sends it into this country, where it is sold at a figure far under the price at the point of production. I am wondering if the Senator from Louisiana is not aware that our American manufacturers engage in the same practice. We build in this country sewing machines which we sell at one price, and when we go to Mexico City we can buy them there for half the domestic price. The same thing is true of steel rails and a hundred commodities that are handled in identically the same fashion that the Senator from Louisiana suggested.

Mr. CLARK and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield and, if so, to whom?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, of course, it has been demonstrated several times by congressional investigations that under our tariff system steel billets have been sold to builders of naval vessels at Glasgow or in Germany or France, possibly to be used against the United States, for less than the price at which the same steel billets could be bought by American builders at the door of the factory in Pittsburgh.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to answer that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LOGAN. I will yield just for a minute, because I want to find terminal facilities pretty soon.

Mr. LONG. I wish to say that that is no argument. We find gasoline selling in San Francisco at one price and in New York at another. We sometimes find gasoline selling in California—where they get the oil out of the ground and refine it—at a higher price than it is selling for in Jersey City. That has often happened, so that is no argument.

Mr. CLARK. That is the old tariff argument on monopoly.

Mr. LONG. Certainly. Now, I am not going to try to convince any free-trader. That is simply impossible. Why they are free-traders, I do not know; but a free-trader cannot be convinced. The fact stands out, however, that America is the cheapest market for oil, America is the cheapest market for sugar, and yet we are protecting our domestic industry. A free-trader cannot be made to see it. They want something like the South American countries have. I do not know why they do not get it. Why in the world they have not gone down there before now, I do not know; but they want free trade. Notwithstanding that America, with its standards of living, has the cheapest commodities, none the less they cannot see it. There is something in the way all the time.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky says he prefers not to yield further, but I will ask him to yield for just a minute.

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Of course the Senator from Louisiana has never studied the tariff question sufficiently to understand the difference between a free-trader and a man who understands the Constitution, and who understands that under the Constitution the only theory upon which a tariff rate can be levied is that of a tariff for revenue. The Senator from Louisiana always insists that anybody who desires to cut out prohibitive tariffs and the tariff taxes that are paid by the American people, not into the Treasury of the United States but into the pockets of protective-tariff barons, is a free-trader.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I ask a question?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Missouri, then, is not a free-trader?

Mr. CLARK. I am not a free-trader; no.

Mr. LONG. The Senator believes in a tariff?

Mr. CLARK. I think it is a legitimate use of governmental power to levy a tariff duty up to the maximum revenue-producing point; but I say that any tariff tax—because the tariff is a tax—which is levied above the maximum revenue-producing point is robbery under the forms of law.

Mr. LONG. Would the Senator accept our Democratic doctrine of the difference in cost of producing that article abroad and in America?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Louisiana is not very familiar with the Democratic doctrine, as he demonstrates by usually sitting on the Republican side when he makes a speech on the tariff. That is not a Democratic doctrine. That is a doctrine which has been enunciated in a good many Republican platforms. It has never been the doctrine of the Democratic Party. I know the Senator is going to the platform of 1924——

Mr. LONG. 1932.

Mr. CLARK. Or the platform of 1928, on which the Democrats received the most disastrous defeat they ever had in the history of the country.

Mr. LONG. I am going to read the platform of 1932.

Mr. OVERTON and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the junior Senator from Louisiana, and then I am going to try to get through. I started out to speak for 45 minutes, and I have been speaking for nearly 3 hours, and I have a right to quit.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, this is the last time I shall transgress.

In view of the fact that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has stated that he believes very firmly in a tariff for revenue, and has made some observations in respect to a tariff on sugar, from which I infer that he is opposed to a tariff on sugar, I desire to ask him if he knows a greater revenue producer in the history of our Nation than the tariff on sugar.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Kentucky. I will expound my tariff views in my own time before the close of this debate. I shall be glad to respond to the question of the Senator from Louisiana, but I do not desire to transgress further on the patience of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator from Missouri—in fact, all Senators. I hope the time may come some day when the Democratic Party will get back to its firm and sound position on the tariff.

Mr. LONG. So do I.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope that time may come. I realize, as I said in the beginning, that it will be a gradual process of getting back to a sound position on the tariff. Things are so terribly out of joint that it will take a long time to get back.

Now let me say, in response to some of the suggestions that have been made, that the last tariff bill—what is the name of that bill?

SEVERAL SENATORS. The Smoot-Hawley bill.

Mr. LOGAN. When the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was passed——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator once more?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. The name by which that tariff bill is commonly known over the United States is the "Hoover-Grundy tariff bill."

Mr. LOGAN. When the Hoover-Grundy tariff bill was passed it drove out of this country hundreds of millions of invested capital, because foreign countries began to put up their tariff walls against us, and our manufacturers went over into foreign countries and established their plants, and carried their money over there, and employed labor in the country where they were located, and spent their money there, and the money circulated all through that country. That, of course, amounted to hundreds of millions in money, and millions of our people found themselves unemployed by reason of it. After they made the article they shipped it back to the United States, and after paying the transportation, still were able to sell it at prices lower than those of some of the competitors who had stayed in the United States all the time.

What I started out to say was that the measure before us is a bill to regulate commerce, and before I conclude what I have tried to say—I have no idea what it is just now, because I have been interrupted by so many, and we have discussed so many things, that I am not entirely sure, but I am going to get back to that with which I started out. I also wish to say at this time that I think a resolution should be adopted providing that a tariff Democrat like the senior Senator from Louisiana should be assigned to a seat on the Republican side, because he is a Republican. A man who believes in a protective tariff and a tariff on sugar cannot be anything else.

The power to regulate commerce is the power we are attempting to exert in the pending bill, and we are doing that through the delegation of authority to the President. I want to read from one who wrote a good many years ago expressing his idea of the meaning of that provision in the Constitution authorizing Congress to regulate commerce. This was his idea about it, and I think it was sound:

> The power to regulate commerce is essentially a retaliatory power. It was bestowed in order to vest in the Government the power to employ retaliatory legislation against nations which excluded our products from their home or colonial ports. If any country would not permit us to traffic with its dependencies, Congress might so "regulate our commerce" with it as to exclude its products, wholly or in part, from our ports. If any nation adopted a policy adverse to our interests, Congress might retaliate by the imposing of discriminatory duties upon its commodities. Congress might also regulate our commerce with any country, which seeks to use its preponderance of capital for the purpose of crushing our industry, in such a manner as to thwart its injurious policy, and to maintain an advantageous system of commercial exchange. But this retaliatory legislation is very different from general duties laid upon the imported products of all foreign countries for the purpose of securing a monopoly to some favored interest. The intention in conferring this power on the Federal Government was not to give it power to foster any particular branch of domestic industry by hostile legislation against the industry of all foreign countries, but to retaliate upon any foreign country that wished to foster their industry by a policy hostile to us. The policy of the Constitution was to secure to our industry an equal competition in the ports of the world, untrammeled by adverse legislation. In a word, the regulation of commerce was designed to promote intercourse, on equal terms, with foreign countries, not to impose barriers to it; to free the entire industry of the country from foreign oppression, not to oppress almost all its branches for the benefit of a few favored interests; to secure our industry free course, not to trammel it; to obtain for it the privilege of flowing in its natural channels, not to warp it into abnormal development.

I think that is the meaning of the provision of our Constitution, that Congress has the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. We cannot do it. To sit here as a Congress and undertake to regulate commerce with nations which have retaliated against us, which have discriminated against us, is an utter impossibility, and everyone here knows that to be true. Then, if we have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and if we cannot do it by sitting here as a congressional body, the only thing we can determine is that we will regulate commerce with foreign nations by delegating the authority to someone who will do it, and that is what this bill proposes to do.

I must beg the pardon of the Senate for the time I have taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have heard nearly all of the Senator's argument on the pending bill, and I think it is one of the best arguments, one of the most powerful arguments, that has been made in the Senate on any subject at this session of the Congress.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I was just wondering whether the Senator from Tennessee had heard that kind of argument when he was voting for tariffs on the products of Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I could not explain that to the Senator from Louisiana in a thousand years. I do not think the Senator can understand those votes at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. Again I thank the Senate for its patience in hearing me. I realize that I have not been able to do all the things I would have liked to do. I did not know it took so long to discuss the tariff. But I am for the pending bill. Perhaps if it had been left to me I would have written a different bill, but it is the only thing we have before us, and I think it will fulfill the purposes Congress has in mind.

Mr. HEBERT obtained the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HEBERT. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent that immediately following this oratorical effort in behalf of free trade on the part of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky there be inserted in the RECORD the address of the Honorable HENRY F. ASHURST on the 11th of April of this year on the protective tariff, in order that the two might be read together.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like to join in that request and to ask that, in conjunction with the address covered by the request of the Senator from Ohio, and in connection therewith, there be included the very eloquent speech made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] during the consideration of the Hoover-Grundy tariff bill in behalf of the flexible-tariff provision.

Mr. FESS. I join in that request. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matters referred to will be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The addresses referred to are as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR ASHURST, APRIL 11, 1934

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I regret to take even a moment of the Senate's time when time is precious, but some attention must be paid to the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and I feel disposed to pay some attention, respectfully of course, to the language he employed.

The Senator, with his scholarship, in a few sentences inveighed against the tax bill passed in 1912 because, forsooth, that tax bill had carried some items of taxes or tariff respecting certain articles imported into the United States.

I regard the Senator from Missouri as one of the ablest exponents of the low-tariff system we have in the Senate. I shall say for him he has tried to be consistent, but even if he were guilty of the apparent inconsistency adverted to by the learned Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], that would not condemn him in my judgment, and he would be secure from my prejudice, because when I took the oath of office I took it without reservation; but there was a pledge to myself that I would never, as a Senator, try to be consistent. The man who tries to be consistent simply says "I decline to be wiser today than I was yesterday."

So, Mr. President, I defend the tax or Tariff Act of 1932. That act laid a tax or tariff upon oils, copper, coal, and lumber imported. I voted for those items and I have searched my heart since then and find no regret for the vote I then cast.

It ought to be always the duty of an American Congress to try to promote the American market. There is no escape from the irresistible logic of the statement that the American is entitled to his own home market.

I am not so much concerned about foreign countries, romantic as their history is, as I am about America, and I rise now to serve notice, respectfully, of course, on the able Senator from Missouri that I have proposed a tax—a tariff, if you prefer—of 10 cents a pound upon all copper imported into the United States.

Mr. President, there are some Democrats, able men, before whom Columbia would be proud to lay her shining hair, who are high-tariff men, but some of them rather conceal the fact that they are for high tariffs. I make no concealment of my position—no concealment whatever.

Daniel Webster went to the Congress of the United States from New Hampshire as a free-trader, but that imperial intellect, yielding to the irresistible forces of logic, preparedness, national destiny, and national advancement, changed from a free-trader into a great champion of protection.

Mr. President, I do not deny that when I came to Congress many years ago I had studied theories and I believed in the theory of low tariffs, and my theories were so fine-spun and so brittle that I could liken them to porcelain or glass. With an agility and a nonchalance at that time that I now even in myself admire, I hurled my theories, my bric-a-brac, my porcelain, my glass, against the concrete wall of fact here for 10 years, and my porcelain was always shattered. It was not the wall that was shattered.

It is not theory that guides and controls the destinies of men. It is fact that controls.

So, Mr. President, this is, it must be, it should be a high-tariff country. You will not survive with your low tariffs. You will not survive with your free trade. You will not elevate, protect, defend, or strengthen the American workingman by a system of low tariffs.

Arizona produced during the World War one-third of all the copper used by the Allies. Arizona produced one-sixth of the copper of the world, and around her copper mines and copper camps a civilization comparable to that of any other city or town in America in culture, in patriotism, and refinement was built. The same thing is true of the other copper-producing States. But, forsooth, when the enormously rich deposits of copper were exposed in Africa and in South America, where labor receives 40 cents a day and works 12 hours daily, the copper-mining industry of the United States not merely fell into obsolescence and disrepair but it was almost exterminated.

If the Senator from Missouri will assist me in securing the passage of the amendment which proposes a tariff of 10 cents per pound on copper imported into the United States, I give him guaranties that Arizona will never ask a dollar from the C.C.C., the C.W.A., the E.R.A., or any other governmental relief agency, because such tariff would at once put to work 30,000 workingmen in the mines and smelters of Arizona; such tariff would at once cause the smoke to pour forth from the smelter stacks now so pathetically empty; it would at once cause the thud of the drill to be heard in the shafts, drifts, and stopes in the mines that are now dark.

I cannot speak now as to what revenue the tariff on oil brought into the Treasury; but I am able to say that under adverse conditions the copper tariff in about 18 months has brought into the Treasury of the United States $712,022. So if the tariff should be increased on copper, not only would it set to work the workmen of Arizona, but it would in large measure restore Nevada, it would restore Montana, it would, Mr. President, aid northern Michigan and some counties in Tennessee. It would at once set to work, with hope and with heart, and with industry and with smiling optimism many workmen in Idaho, Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico.

Senators may talk their fine-spun theories, but when I point them to a system which sets men to work at good wages, no shafts of ridicule pierce such system.

The able Senator from Missouri doubtless will say, because the Senator from Missouri has not only won laurels in the fields of statesmanship, but he has already won and will continue to win greater laurels in biographical literature, that the great Democratic statesmen of our early days were free-traders. I read with pride, not only because he was a fellow Senator but because of my admiration for accurate writers of history, the Senator's Life of John Quincy Adams. I do not perceive why he chose John Quincy Adams; I should have thought he would have chosen some free-trader, but doubtless this able historian will attempt in the future to tell us that Thomas Jefferson was a free-trader, or that Thomas Jefferson was at least a low-tariff man.

Mr. President, I have 16 letters or copies of letters written by Thomas Jefferson pointing out that if the United States hoped to grow, expand, and become strong and efficient in governmental affairs and a power for good in the world she must protect herself by a proper tariff—letters written by Thomas Jefferson, the saint and sage of the Democratic Party.

And Andrew Jackson—what message comes to us from the Hermitage, from the grand old warrior who announced that we ought to have a protective tariff in order to stimulate and build up the industries in America that were necessary in times of war? By the way, Andrew Jackson was not nominated or even proposed for President by Tennessee. It was the high protective tariff State of Pennsylvania that championed the cause of Andrew Jackson; it was the State which from the writing of the Federal Constitution down to this day has stood for protection. Thomas Fitzsimmons, in the Constitutional Convention in 1787, announced the protective-tariff system from Pennsylvania.

It was James Madison, of Virginia, 8 years as Secretary of State and 8 years as President, who guided through the House of Representatives of the United States in 1789 the first tariff bill. It was that superb intellect—and Virginia has contributed a legion of them; they are here today in the persons of her Senators, although they may not agree with Madison on that point—it was James Madison who in his own hand wrote the preamble of the first tariff bill, which preamble stated:

"In order to protect the industries of the United States and raise revenue."

That preamble was written by the hand of James Madison, from whose hand and brain many great State papers have come.

When Pennsylvania, the high-tariff State, launched Andrew Jackson as a candidate for the Presidency, Martin Van Buren and Aaron Burr—Burr then had fallen into disrepute and was at that time a ruined man—championed his candidacy. I shall not consume the valuable time of the Senate to relate how much injustice has been done Aaron Burr more than to say that he saw in Jackson, as did Van Buren, possibilities of Democratic success. They championed Jackson, whereupon Mr. Ritchie, one of the most—if not the most—distinguished editor in the Democratic Party at that time, wrote to General Jackson and said:

"We have noted that you are advanced as a candidate for the Presidency"—that was in Jackson's first race—"and we desire in frankness to know if you are going to support the high-tariff system," now I use Mr. Ritchie's words, "and if you are going to support a high-tariff system, the support of Virginia will be relaxed."

Jackson, in a letter that I once could quote by heart—I shall only give it a passing reference—went on to point out to Mr. Ritchie that our workmen without a protective tariff could not compete with the workmen of foreign countries; that our industries could not succeed without a protective tariff; and Andrew Jackson, just as he never did, on that occasion did not retreat. Under the arrows of the enemy in the Creek and Seminole war Jackson would not retreat. When he faced the cold pistol barrel of his fellow duelist, Charles Dickinson, he allowed Dickinson the first shot, and then he fired; Jackson did not retreat. Under the guns on the plains of Chalmette, Jackson did not retreat; and under the political guns which cause many worthy men to retreat who do not even on the field of battle retreat, under the political guns Jackson declined to retreat, stood for a protective tariff, and served 8 years as President of the United States.

I respectfully say to my friend the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], one of the statesmen of the Senate, who, with his superb intellect, adorns this Chamber, that, while I did not agree with him the other day in his speech in support of the Presidential veto, mine eyes, mine eyes have long been dry but tears almost came to them under the majestic spell of his eloquence pleading for what he believed to be right. Although I did not agree with him then, I say to him that I am right on this question, and he is not following the true doctrine of democracy when he advocates low tariffs and free trade. The low-tariff or free-trade doctrine is one that has been engrafted upon the Democratic Party by men who sit in academic chairs and do not have to meet pay rolls.

So I serve notice in advance that the keen thrust, the almost sarcastic suggestion of the able Senator from Missouri that some disreputable thing was done in 1932, when we levied a tariff in a tax bill, falls harmless against the armor of historical truth and the logical position which we Democrats who are in favor of a tariff occupy on this occasion.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield for a moment only.

Mr. LONG. Just for a question.

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. The Senator is not trying to convert the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] on the tariff question, is he?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I believe that even the Senator from Missouri may be converted. I refuse to believe that he, with his brilliant intellect, well trained in college——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield in just a moment—trained in war, a superb lawyer under the tutelage of his distinguished father, whose memory we revere—I refuse to believe that such a Senator will not yield to logic and to common sense.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator very much, indeed, for his very kind compliment. I should like to say to the Senator, however, that when he offers his amendment providing for a tax of 10 cents on copper the Senate will have an opportunity to decide definitely between two theories, because I intend to offer as a substitute for that suggestion a proposal to repeal all the excise taxes contained in the Revenue Act of 1932.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator's statement is commendable, at least from the viewpoint of frankness, because he attempted to do that, so I am advised, in the committee; but, of course, when he shall make his motion to strike out these excise taxes, I will then insist that the motion shall not prevail. Why, forsooth, when copper brings $750,000 in revenue to the Treasury, should that revenue be refused, sir?

Mr. CLARK. What does that tax cost the American people?

Mr. ASHURST. What does it cost the American people?

Mr. CLARK. That is the fairest test of a tax; not the amount that it brings into the Treasury but the amount of revenue it brings into the Treasury in comparison to the amount in which the American people are mulcted.

Mr. ASHURST. What does it cost the American people? Mr. President, I decline further to cavil with one who asks what will justice cost. "Oh, it is too expensive to have justice; let us have more injustice." I do not care to prolong a controversy with a man who is going to refuse justice to an American industry because it costs money.

Mr. President, some years ago in one of the thriving cities of Arizona—I shall not mention its name, as I do not wish to expose some of my friends to what would be good-natured raillery because of the position in which they were placed, so I will simply say it is a town well known for its hospitality, well known for its Americanism, well known from the fact that it has poured forth the red metal, copper, into the veins and channels of trade for 50 years; with the knowledge that this town produced vast quantities of red metal, copper, it was thought to be wise, inasmuch as many of the great cathedrals and other monumental buildings in Europe had been roofed with copper for more than 500 years, and that copper was durable, its ductility great, its tensile strength of a high degree, to roof a new schoolhouse in that town with copper. So, with enthusiasm, the trustees of the school district announced in proposals for bids that copper must be used for the roof of the building. Very good. They received the acclaim of their fellow townsmen, who said, "Now, Arizona and America are coming into their own; we are going to roof some of our buildings with copper." However, they overlooked to say "copper mined and processed in the United States", so the contractor sent to a foreign country and, at an exceedingly low cost, brought in great sheets of copper and roofed the building in a copper town in the Southwest with copper brought from a foreign country.

That was a refinement of irony; and the Senate will see now why I did not mention the name of the town and did not mention the names of the men who at that time happened to be on the school board.

I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a table which I have from the Treasury Department, being figures showing the importations of copper and the amount of duty collected thereon since the last revenue act was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I should like to ask the Senator a question. During my service here it is my recollection that I have seen a statement in print that copper ingots have been laid down in New York at 6 cents a pound. I wonder if the Senator knows whether there is any truth in that statement?

Mr. ASHURST. I know of some copper laid down in some ports—I shall not say New York, but laid down in some of the Atlantic ports, and, indeed, at some of the Pacific ports—for a little less than 6 cents a pound, and some at 6 cents a pound. I will ask the Senator from Nevada if I am not correct as to that?

Mr. MCCARRAN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ASHURST. So, it will be perceived that it is only by a remote excursion into the realms of imagination that anyone can be led to believe that we can mine and produce copper, pay our workmen good wages so that they may live as we claim we want our workmen to live, as dignified American citizens, and compete with Africa and South America, where, I repeat, many of the mines are richer than ours and the workmen wear only what a Senator during the debate a while ago referred to as that well-known article of habiliment, the breechclout, and labors 12 hours a day, and, as a magnate said, "They do not organize; do not bother us with organization." It is not possible for America to compete unless and until we have a proper tariff on copper or an embargo—and I do not hesitate at all to use the word "embargo" if we cannot make adequate provision by a tariff. Unless we shall have one of these, the entire copper-producing business and the copper-smelting industry in the United States will be gone.

Mr. President, may I say that he would be inhuman who wished another war and he would be a fool—I will withdraw the word "fool" and say he would be an unpretending simpleton—who did not see in certain quarters of this earth manifestations working, interchanges and exchanges, sinuous methods, devices being employed that may lead us on ultimately into some trouble; I hesitate to say would lead us into war. I abhor the words so much that it is with difficulty I approach the subject, but should we most unhappily be drawn into any conflict I do not want the United States to be found in the position, if such unfortunate eventuality should occur, as we were in during the World War. When the World War broke out we did not have supplies of manganese at all comparable with our needs, whereupon it was necessary to import manganese, because next to copper manganese is the most essential of all the war minerals.

It will be remembered by Senators that when the steamship Cyclops was lost she went down, and the loss of the Cyclops will be remembered with grief by Senators, because a nephew of one of our Senators was on board. All aboard were lost. She is now at the Port of Missing Men. No one knows what became of her. Not a spar, not a rope, not a board, not a piece of evidence survives today to tell us what happened to the Cyclops. She was laden with manganese, trying to reach an American port from Brazil in order that our factories might make weapons, munitions of war, to help win the World War in which we were engaged. In other words, we had to depend upon foreign countries for our supplies of manganese.

I do not intend to have it said when I retire from public service, "There goes a man who served in the Senate a long time, but he never had the vision to see to it that we of the United States ought to be producing all we need and require, that America should produce her own manganese and her own copper; but supinely he sat and permitted free-trade and low-tariff theorists to allow the importation of copper and manganese into the United States from foreign countries." Whatever may be my political fate, it shall not be charged that I sat here supinely and did not protest against this doctrine of free trade.

Mr. President, let me say a personal word. I am not going to retire from the Senate unless my constituents retire me. From the gathering of my friends it would seem that in my State they believe they can retire me. Indeed, they have paid me the compliment in my State of bringing out five very excellent and able gentlemen against me. I not only have one opponent to defeat but I have five worthy gentlemen to defeat. Scrubs never run against me. Always high-grade, excellent men run against me. Indeed, one of my most formidable opponents, a sound lawyer, a brilliant orator, well known by 25 or 30 Senators here, named Barnum, and whatever advertising he may obtain out of my reference to him he is welcome to, because if he or any other of my present opponents be chosen, I do not think the Senate or the country will suffer by my displacement or by his election; but, "believe you me", as I heard on the campus at Harvard, they will not displace me without some effort on their part! [Laughter.]

My own displacement might amount to but very little. Possibly there may be half a dozen men here—I shall not name them—whom we would miss upon their retirement, but if I or most of us were to retire, we would leave about the same impression that we would if we put our finger in a basin of water and withdrew the finger. [Laughter.]

I say again, in all seriousness, that I have no apologies to make, here or elsewhere, for my advocacy of a protective tariff. I chose this tariff course for myself more than 14 years ago, and I have adhered to it. Whenever I meet my good friend, the present able and cultured Secretary of State—I am sure he has an affection for me and I know I have an affection for him—I suspect that he knows if I secure opportunity I shall try to induce him to come over to my idea of a protective tariff and thus make America strong and efficient.

I thank the Senate for its attention.

FROM ADDRESS BY SENATOR FESS, MARCH 30, 1932

Mr. FESS. * * *

Mr. President, I have regarded the enactment of the flexible provision in the tariff law as the most important feature of tariff legislation in the last 40 years. I think writing into the law the flexible provision which permits under certain limitations a change in the tariff duty on a single item, without bringing into discussion and throwing open the whole tariff issue, is the longest step toward scientific tariff making that has ever been taken by the Congress. When the proposal was first made some of us questioned its wisdom. One source of doubt was whether in a tariff act embodying many thousand items the rates on individual commodities should be made subject to change by the Executive alone. When it was first suggested the Republicans were somewhat divided, as well as were the Democrats, as to whether under our system such an innovation in tariff legislation was wise. There are still those who have in their minds a doubt as to its wisdom, but the flexible provision has been in operation for a number of years, and I think has clearly demonstrated its wisdom.

When it was first proposed our friends on the other side of the aisle objected to it on the ground that there would be too many changes; that the changes would come too frequently, and thus business would be too much disturbed; yet when the last tariff measure was considered the argument then presented was that there had not been a sufficient number of changes; that there had only been 35 changes of rates, and I recognized at once that the argument was very largely a matter of politics. Still the question involves a sufficiently important issue to justify it being judiciously considered and discussed; and it has been so discussed ever since the pending bill has been before us. I regard the discussion of the tariff question which has taken place on the pending bill as being on as high a plane as any debates on any subject I have heard in this body.

Here is a proposal to change the flexible provisions of existing law. I am opposed to the change. I am opposed to it because it would nullify the very object sought to be attained by the insertion of the flexible provision in the law. If the flexible provision of the tariff act has any merit, or contains any element which should meet approval, it is the possibility which it contains of eliminating the logrolling process that inevitably creeps into general tariff legislation. If it is at all possible, the throwing of the whole question of tariff revision into Congress at one time should be avoided; first, because under such circumstances, business cannot be stable; and, second, so long as the rates in the various schedules are uncertain there is bound to be more or less of a break-down in the employment of labor.

The purpose of the flexible provision was twofold: First, to minimize logrolling; and, second, to avoid throwing the whole question of the tariff into the hopper and disturbing business everywhere for an indefinite period. The flexible provision affords an opportunity to take up one item in the tariff law and deal with it alone, without taking up all the other items of the various schedules.

The proposal for a flexible provision in the tariff was first given impetus by President Roosevelt, who called attention to it at different times in messages he sent to the Congress, and the movement for it was advanced under President Taft. Its purpose was to avoid the necessity of taking up the whole tariff, but to make provision so that one schedule could be dealt with at a time and dealt with finally without taking up the others, thus offering the basis of trades. "If you do not give me your vote on my item, I will not give you my vote on your item." We wanted to avoid that; and that was a purpose of establishing the Tariff Commission, as well as to find a basis for scientific tariff legislation.

I think the Tariff Commission has justified its existence. The first body was not called a "commission." It was called a "board." After a certain time it was discontinued, as all of us have heard at different times, as a result of Congress refusing to make the necessary appropriation for its operation. The law never was repealed. The Commission simply discontinued its work by reason of being unable to operate.

Then, in 1916, under the presidency of Mr. Wilson, the present Tariff Commission was created, or the skeleton of it. I was for it; Republicans generally were for it, because it was a step in the direction of scientific tariff making in the first place. It also would in a way minimize the logrolling element; but, of course, it would not entirely get rid of it.

Then, as an outgrowth of that, we have the flexible provision. The objection to that in many quarters was that it was not warranted under the Constitution; that it did not have constitutional sanction. Under that particular provision, final judgment was held in abeyance for a considerable time. However, the purpose is good; and that is not only scientific tariff making, not only to put the tariff on a basis where it is possible to deal with 1 schedule without dealing with the other 15, but especially to make it possible to deal with 1 or more items in a schedule without having to take up the others and deal with them.

If there is one ambition that both sides of this body should have, it is to minimize the element of logrolling in tariff making. That is the one objection to former methods that most of us have seen and wanted to avoid. No step has been taken that even approaches the possibility of doing this like the flexible provision; and with that as a background, legislation on the subject is warranted.

We provided that the Tariff Commission, after making a finding, may make its recommendation as to changes of rates on articles on the dutiable list, with the possible approval or veto of the President. I think that is the way it should be. This proposal goes to the very heart of the very issue we want to avoid; namely, instead of its being an Executive function, under this bill it is to be a legislative function. Instead of the matter going to one mind, where unity of decision is not only possible but lack of it is impossible, it is proposed now to send it to 500 minds, where unity of decision is clearly impossible; and again we have the very essence of the injury in legislation that we are trying now to avoid.

I realize the force of the statement that when a duty is changed it ought to be changed by the legislative and not by the executive branch of the Government. I admit that there is force in that; but if the purpose is to avoid logrolling, then instead of going to 500 minds for decision, the matter should go to one. The present law has operated wholesomely, sanely, and rationally ever since it has been on the statute books, and it has justified its existence.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has paid a very high tribute to the Tariff Commission. He says its actions have been wholesome and sane, and he has used many other expressions of the kind. Why, then, was it necessary 2 years ago for the Senator and his colleagues to enact a general revision of the tariff carrying 890 increases?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the McCumber law had been on the statute books for some time. There was a general belief that its rates on agricultural products were too low. There was a contention all over the country that there had been heavy importations of various articles from Belgium and other countries of low-paid labor, due to the low rates of the McCumber law, which left similar articles of American production without tariff protection.

The Senator evidently thinks he can leave the inference that the legislation embodied in the last tariff revision was to be a downward revision. That is the first time anybody ever heard of that sort of a suggestion. The downward revision of any tariff law might be necessary; and ordinarily, under the development of our mass production, where competition brings about a reduction of prices, downward revision might be desirable. Our Democratic friends, however, are the people who demand downward revision. If Republicans start to revise the tariff, Democrats always howl about its being downward; but, on the other hand, when we revise the tariff it is for the purpose of furnishing protection where the protection is inadequate. So it was in the case of this law.

Mr. HARRISON. As a matter of fact, then, as I understand the Senator, while the Tariff Commission is a great institution, it was unable 2 years ago to cope with the situation; and, because of the condition, the Congress found it necessary to change 890 rates.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no. The Tariff Commission will be engaged in constant study, through their surveys, of all the items that are sent to them by order of this body. They will be in session constantly, and when they report on a certain item, in accordance with a resolution that we send to them, if they find that because of any elements that enter in the rate is too low, their recommendation is that it be increased. If the rate is too high, their recommendation is that it be decreased. It is inevitable in the development of the industry that it is not static, and a rate established today will not be a suitable rate 20 years from now. That is inevitable. It grows out of the development of industry, and we ought not to be compelled to throw the whole question in the hopper, and deal with all these issues, if we can get a tariff commission capable of responding to the resolutions that the Senate sends to them to investigate particular items to see whether the rates are too high or too low. That is precisely what the Commission exists for.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I understand the Senator to conclude that whatever rate the Tariff Commission may ascertain should be proclaimed by the President as the proper rate?

Mr. FESS. No; I do not take that position.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator have the Tariff Commission proclaim it?

Mr. FESS. The Tariff Commission gathers the information and makes its recommendation.

Mr. HARRISON. To the President?

Mr. FESS. The President can act upon it favorably or unfavorably.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator, then, would give to the President greater authority in accepting the recommendations of the Tariff Commission than he is willing to give to the Congress?

Mr. FESS. The Senator certainly would rather have one mind decide a matter in which we are trying to get rid of logrolling than to have 500 minds undertake it.

Mr. HARRISON. In other words, the Senator would rather place the discretion in the President of the United States than in the representatives of the American people. That is truly Hamiltonian.

Mr. FESS. That would be a perfectly safe thing provided the President is acting upon information that has been gathered by a commission created by this body, and this body sends a resolution to the commission asking for their information. That is in accordance with our legislation.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is very close to the President.

Mr. FESS. No; the Senator is not.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; the Senator is. He admits it sometimes when he talks to the newspaper boys.

Mr. FESS. Not any more. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. But I want to ask the Senator, because I know he is close to the President, what were the reasons that prompted the President to have so little faith in the findings of the Tariff Commission that recently he held up their findings and sent them back to them?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, we would not give the President the veto power if we did not intend him to use his judgment on the facts that are submitted to him. Why does not the Senator ask me why the President should ever sign a bill or why he should ever veto a bill? That is the very nature of our political organization.

Mr. HARRISON. That would take a good deal of an answer. I can tell the Senator why the President would veto certain bills if I knew what influences were behind them. In this case, however, the Senator from Ohio knows the particular rate I am talking about; does he not?

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Ohio would not risk stating that he knows anything the Senator from Mississippi is implying that he does not say.

Mr. HARRISON. I refer to cherries. As the Senator knows, cherries are raised out in California.

Mr. FESS. In Ohio, also.

Mr. HARRISON. That may be the reason for the President's action. I did not know that before.

Mr. FESS. Very likely.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Tariff Commission found that the rates on a certain kind of cherries should be reduced, and the President would not stand for it. He was unwilling to accept their judgment. He perhaps did not think they had made a proper ascertainment, and so forth; and he sent back their finding. Does the Senator know why that was done?

Mr. FESS. Because it did not meet with his approval. Therefore, the President acted just as the Senator from Mississippi would have acted if he had been in the same position.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought perhaps the Senator would take the other angle. Since he believes so much in the ascertainment of facts by a tariff commission, if they went into the investigation, and it was a fair investigation, certainly he would accept their finding.

Mr. FESS. Oh, no! If we should do that we would not even have them report, either to Congress or to the President.

Mr. HARRISON. In another case, the case of tomatoes; some tomatoes are raised out in California.

Mr. FESS. And in Florida.

Mr. HARRISON. In Florida, but not in Ohio; so the same reason cannot be advanced.

Mr. FESS. Oh, yes; in Ohio, also. We are a great tomato country.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator, then, would advance the same reason for the President refusing to accept the findings of the Tariff Commission on tomatoes as on cherries, would he?

Mr. FESS. The reason of the Senator is that the facts are not convincing.

Mr. HARRISON. Did not the Senator, in the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley bill, vote for an amendment that compelled the President either to veto or to sign a proposal within a certain time and not leave it optional with him whether or not he might send it back? In other words, it either had to become a law or he had to veto it.

Mr. FESS. The Senator may have voted for it. I do not see why I would not vote for it. I do not recall whether I did or not.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator to say a moment ago that the President ought to have the power either to accept it or to send it back to the Commission.

Mr. FESS. We gave him that power.

Mr. HARRISON. You did give him the power; yes.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Mississippi wants to give it to the Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to give it to the Congress of the United States, where the fathers placed it, and where for 140 years we have had it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I appreciate these fine interruptions. Both the Senator from Mississippi and I want to get rid of log-rolling. The difference between him and me is that I am in favor of a plan that would get rid of it. He is proposing a plan that would not get rid of it. I would not say he knows that, but I think he knows that it would not get rid of it, for everyone must realize the result of sending such a matter back to this body for decision, because various sections of the country are interested in various items. My friend the Senator from Mississippi says he has that covered, and he thinks that it is covered by the provision which will not allow an amendment to be offered which is not germane. In the first place, that is a weak undertaking. In the second place, it would not work. Nobody can be a Member of this body for 1 year without being convinced that it could not work.

There would be no limit to the discussion as to whether a particular amendment was germane or not. Under some circumstances a thing is a raw material. In a different set of circumstances the same thing is a finished product, and the finished product will become raw material in some other finished product in whose manufacture it is used. There is no limit to the argument over whether a thing is germane or not.

Secondly, here we are in 1932, with the gold standard abandoned in most of the European countries, with money having been cheapened, and because of that the rates of our protective law are being nullified; and on the other side of the aisle are men clamoring for protection of articles which come from their sections, and if they cannot get it in a tariff bill they will attempt to get it in a tax bill, the tax bill being for the purpose of raising revenue, but protection for the opposite of raising revenue, to decrease the importations on behalf of the home products.

In that situation suppose there comes from the Tariff Commission a report on some particular item on which there is a duty, and they recommend an increase; how many Members in this body will be on their feet to offer amendments to the particular item on which the duty is being considered, just as my friend from Washington is offering an amendment to the pending bill, which I do not think is in order, but which, in all probability, will be held in order? It shows the interest, the keen intensity to seize the only opportunity of getting a vote on an article produced in a particular section of the country; and we cannot blame Senators for such actions.

Suppose a report comes from the Tariff Commission to this body, and a bill is introduced to carry their recommendation into effect. I rise and offer an amendment including another item. The Senator from Oklahoma rises and offers another one. The Senator from Arizona states, "I have an item here that I want considered", and he cannot offer it, but he says, "I want it printed. I want to offer it if the opportunity comes."

When I offer my amendment somebody raises a point of order, and the President of the Senate sustains it. I immediately appeal from his decision. Every Senator here who wants the same privilege of presenting his item will vote with me to overrule the President's decision, and we will open the bill to unlimited amendment. That is what we are doing every day.

The question of germaneness is for the Senate, whether it applies to appropriation bills, or what not. When appropriation bills are involved the question must be submitted to the Senate for a vote under the rule. In other cases it will be laid before the Senate by virtue of the appeal. That is exactly the same situation. Write into the flexible provision language making a report from the Tariff Commission subject to amendment only when it is germane, and see where we will get.

My friends, that is the thing we want to avoid. I am opposed to returning a report of the Tariff Commission, a body created to deal with a single subject, to Congress, with 435 Members in one branch and 96 in the other. There will be the same logrolling the moment that is done, and that is why I am opposed to that. It would be a great mistake if after taking this long stride, the most progressive for 40 years, we turn about and nullify it by adopting this proposal.

I had intended saying something about the consumers' counsel provided for. The substitute contains three outstanding items, the second of which is the provision for the consumers' counsel. All I have to say is this, that I do not think it is very commendable for any Senator to assume that he does not represent the people. I do not think it is commendable for any man to assert that the Government in its agencies does not represent the people. I think it is an offense to suggest that the Department of Justice does not represent the people. I do not think it is commendable to announce that the prosecuting agencies of this Government are representing interests and do not represent the people of this country.

I resent the inference that when I stand on this floor and vote my conviction, although it does not coincide with manufactured clamor in the interest of some particular selfish movement, that I do not represent the people when I refuse to be merely a weather vane to find which way the wind is blowing last. If to represent the people a Senator had to be a weathercock, trying to ascertain what was the last desire of a particular group, I should not want to be a Senator.

I do not take kindly to the suggestion that in tariff matters we have to set up a people's counsel, assuming that the Government, the Tariff Commission, and the people who appear are against the interests of the people as a whole. That is not only an indefensible attitude for a Senator to take, but it tends to create class feeling and intense hatred. It is tantamount to saying, "All legislation is sordid, all legislation is selfish, all legislation is in the interest of somebody except the people, the people only are excluded."

I do not think such sentiments ought to be heard in this body. I assume that every Member of the Senate desires to do what is right in the premises, that his chief concern is to represent all the people, rather than the few.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me?

Mr. HEBERT. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to read a couple of paragraps from another speech of the Senator from Ohio delivered a short time ago on the same subject, if the Senator from Rhode Island will yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will not the Senator postpone that until the conclusion of my remarks?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want to interfere with the Senator, but I think the quotation would be very appropriate at this place, and I think the Senate would like to read it in view of the remarks of the Senator from Ohio about the pending bill today.

Mr. HEBERT. I fear it might open up a discussion which would be rather extended.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well; I will defer it to a later occasion.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee is suggesting that I make a speech at one time and then later on abandoned the principle underlying my remarks. I hope the opportunity will be given him to read what I said. I do not want to interfere with the speech of the Senator from Rhode Island, but I am very anxious to have the Senator from Tennessee read the speech to which he has referred.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a good speech on that side of the question.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator always makes a good speech on any side of a question. [Laughter.]

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

During the delivery of Mr. LOGAN's speech,

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I have a conference report on the legislative appropriation bill. It contains provision for the Government Printing Office, whose appropriation will expire tomorrow. If the Senator would yield, I should like to present and ask for the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland presents a conference report, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 15, and the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 12 and 16 to the bill (H.R. 8617) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 15, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by such amendment of the House insert the sum "$443,880"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by such amendment of the House insert the sum "$212,934"; and the House agree to the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

After the conclusion of Mr. LOGAN's speech,

RECIPROCAL-TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, the debate on the pending measure has been unusual in two respects. First, until this morning no one has risen to advocate its passage unless it be the Senator from Mississippi in his statement explaining its provisions as it came from the Committee on Finance; and, second, the extraordinarily able and thorough presentation of the arguments of those Senators who oppose its passage. These arguments have ranged from constitutional objections to its objectionable technical phases, and have pointed out the dangers which lie in the course of its administration.

I shall try not to repeat that which has been so well said by other Senators, so I propose to confine my discussion for the most part to what I fear will be its effects upon the industrial life of that part of the country with which I am most familiar, never unmindful, however, that what is true in respect of conditions there may be equally true in respect to every other section of the country.

The Secretary of State in his argument before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives on March 8 last, as reported at page 5 of the printed hearings, speaking of the so-called "reciprocal tariffs" in other countries and the way they are put into effect, said:

> In some cases the legislative branch establishes in advance a minimum scale of duties, part or all of which may be granted to other countries by agreements. The more common practice, however, is to start with a general tariff and authorize the executive branch of the government to grant reductions in the course of negotiations, without prescribing in advance the amount of the reductions, such rates established by treaty then constituting the second or conventional column of the country's tariff. In a number of countries, such as Canada, Poland, Switzerland, Greece, and others, the executive has authority to enter into and make effective agreements such as is proposed by the pending bill without the approval of Parliament. In a majority of cases, while it is true that treaty reductions are not to be permanently operative until approved by the Parliament, it is true in practice that the parliamentary approval is most often a perfunctory matter. The reductions embodied in such agreements are put into operation at least provisionally on a day set by the executive without waiting for parliamentary action. This is especially true in those countries having a responsible cabinet form of government, mainly in Europe, or where the governmental structure is such that the general tariff authority is largely vested in the hands of the executive, as in many countries of Latin America.

I call particular attention to the qualifying phrase in the statement I have just quoted:

> In a majority of cases, while it is true that treaty reductions are not to be permanently operative until approved by the Parliament, it is true in practice that the parliamentary approval is most often a perfunctory matter.

If approval of Parliament is required, even in countries where there is no constitutional requirement for it, how much more is such action necessary in our own country where it is specifically provided.

If other countries are able to function under such requirements, then surely the United States can. Moreover, we are not without experience in that direction. We have operated in that way for more than a hundred years, and we have progressed to a point where we have challenged the admiration, if not the envy, of the world.

WORK DONE BY SUBORDINATES

We are told the Chief Executive will use this power with discretion. No one doubts the sincerity of the President. He will not—he cannot—give attention to the multiplicity of details. They must be left to subordinates. We have already observed the effects of the broad and almost unlimited delegation of legislative powers to the Executive.

In this very Congress the executive orders prepared by bureaucrats with the ruthlessness and abandon of Russian commissars, issued in pursuance of that legislation, were found unjustifiable in the case of the treatment accorded to veterans, and were overruled even in the face of a veto from the Chief Executive.

If we pass this bill I venture the assertion we shall again be called upon, and perhaps many times, to overrule the Chief Executive if we are to protect our industries and provide a livelihood for our people—not on the basis of European or other standards but according to those forms not known anywhere on earth except in our own country.

In the formulation of these proposed trade agreements it cannot be that the administration expects there will be any advantage accruing to American industry, even though it be hoped some benefit to agriculture is to follow. Indeed, the formula announced by the Secretary of Agriculture when he appeared before the Ways and Means Committee indicated that industrial activities alone will be affected. He said:

> I recognize that any action under this bill, in case it becomes a law, would of necessity have to be rather slow action; that the domestic industries affected by such action should be given the same kind of consideration as we are now affording to agricultural industries. * * *

While every attempt to have the representatives of the administration indicate what articles of manufacture are to be traded away or are to be considered or, as I believe, are destined for extinction, have so far failed, yet we may well infer that finer textiles are headed for the discard if we may judge by the observations of the Secretary of Agriculture.

What, then, may the mill operatives of Rhode Island and New England and other manufacturing centers expect? Are their wages to be increased by this proposed process of extinction and the removal of duties so as to encourage importations of like commodities from abroad? Will it result in giving more employment to them? Will their jobs be made more secure? No one has appeared to answer these questions. At any rate, none of the proponents of this measure has even attempted to do so. Yet an answer to them is vital to the tens of thousands of workers in the fine cotton and woolen and silk mills of New England and other sections of the country. They will want to know—and I submit they have a right to know—whether the administration contemplates trading away their means of livelihood.

Nor are they motivated by mere idle curiosity. They have learned from bitter experience what eventuates under low tariff duties on textiles. Many of them remember the periods of depression following the enactment of Democratic tariff laws providing lowered rates of duty. They are not anxious for a return of those conditions. I know those who advocate the enactment of the measure will say that the existing duties did not prevent the existing depression. I know the familiar argument that high tariffs have been its cause. The so-called "economists" have shouted it from the housetops, spokesmen for the Democratic administration have reiterated the statement, but they have disregarded the facts, as I shall presently show.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States * * *.

Article II, section 2, provides:

He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur * * *.

It must be clear to anyone who studies this provision that the sole power to collect taxes and impose duties and excises resides with the Congress. Up to the present time it seems to me there has never been any question about this. No one will deny that the proposed reciprocal tariff agreements to be entered into by the Chief Executive under the pending bill will in effect be a transference of the power of Congress specifically conferred by the Constitution. Whatever these agreements may be called, the fact remains that they are agreements to be entered into between this Government and the governments of other countries. In that respect, they are treaties within the meaning of section 2 of the Constitution, which confers upon the Chief Executive the power to make treaties, provided, however, two-thirds of the Senators present concur therein.

This bill would negative this provision of the Constitution and would place the entire control of the treaty-making power and of the ratification of treaties in the hands of the Chief Executive. If, now, under the parliamentary procedure referred to by the Secretary of State in his testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House in respect of other countries where, as I apprehend, there is no express limitation upon the Government or any branch thereof, as is the case in our own country, there is need for parliamentary action, then how much greater reason is there for having such approval by the Congress of the United States when in point of fact the fundamental law under which we operate specifically requires it.

OUR FOREIGN COMMERCE, FOREIGN DEBTS, AND THE TARIFF

We are constantly reminded that the existing tariff law is responsible for the loss of our foreign trade. For example, I picked at random from the daily press during the past week the following quotation from one of the papers published in the South. Speaking of the pending measure, and comparing it to the tariff law of 1930, this paper said editorially:

Instead of being a blind speculation, that measure (the tariff bill of 1930) was a sweeping loss fully realized before it was enacted. While it was being considered by the Republican Congress some 30 nations protested against its shut-out duties, and threatened to retaliate if the measure was passed. One thousand leading economists protested against it, declaring it would be ruinous to our world trade and urging Herbert Hoover to veto it. Congress and the President ignored the storm signal, and, as a result, our commerce was wrecked.

In the discussion which has been had in the Senate today I noticed that the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] made an observation very much in line with that to which I have just adverted, that the tariff law of 1930 was responsible for the wrecking of our foreign trade. So I propose to give some facts in the course of what I have to say this afternoon bearing upon that very question.

The quotation just read by me is but one of the thousands of loose statements that have been made regarding the effects of the tariff bill of 1930 upon our foreign trade. The fact is that the present program of the administration, with all of its reform measures, with its lavish expenditures of public funds, distributed with a largess such as no one in this country has ever known before, has done more to delay recovery than any other one thing. Let it be observed that our own country is not progressing out of the present depression as fast as other countries throughout the world, notwithstanding they have tried none of these new panaceas. Of course, relief for those in distress must be provided. No one in this country can be heard to say that our fellow citizens shall remain in want so long as there are any funds to procure for them the necessaries of life, but recovery is one thing, reform is another. As has repeatedly been said to us, let us consider first things first.

My idea is that recovery is and should be the subject of our first consideration. If, thereafter, there be need of reform—and I admit there are some conditions in this country which, for the benefit of all of us, should be changed—they can then be considered in their own proper time.

But let me revert to the subject of the loss of our world trade, which has been charged so many times to the operations of the tariff law of 1930. Let us examine critically the import statistics that are available to us, and which cover the period for the past 2 or 3 years. No one can doubt that imports have fallen tremendously in total value, because the figures show that they have declined from $4,338,572,000 in 1929 to $1,423,467,000 in 1933. It is to be noted, however, in passing that imports in 1933 exceeded in value those of 1932 by about $100,000,000.

As a basis for our observations, I now cite the figures showing the value of our total imports, both dutiable and nondutiable, from 1929 to 1933:

Total imports

Year:	Value
1929	$4,338,572,000
1930	3,114,455,000
1931	2,088,455,000
1932	1,325,093,000
1933	1,423,467,000

Having in mind the evidence adduced by Secretaries Hull, Roper, and Wallace, when they appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House earlier in the session, in which they seemed to want to create the impression that this tremendous decline of importations during the past 5 years was due to the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930, let us divide the total imports into two groups, one the dutiable articles and the other the articles imported free of duty. We shall then see the facts in their true perspective.

It will appear that the decrease in the value of imports was greater in the case of articles entering free of duty than in the case of dutiable articles. For example, imports entering free of duty declined from $2,880,128,000 in 1929 to $901,782,000 in 1933, or an average decline of 68.7 percent. For purposes of comparison, I am including at this point in my remarks the total imports entering free of duty during the years 1929 to 1933:

Total imports free of duty

Year:	Value
1929	$2,880,128,000
1930	2,081,132,000
1931	1,391,693,000
1932	885,536,000
1933	901,782,000

By way of contrast, it is to be noted the import value of articles subject to duty declined from $1,458,444,000 in 1929 to $521,635,000 in 1933, or 64.2 percent. For purposes of comparison, I am including in my remarks and shall insert at this point a table of the total imports that were dutiable during the years 1929 to 1933, both inclusive:

Total imports dutiable

Year:	Value
1929	$1,458,444,000
1930	1,032,954,000
1931	696,762,000
1932	439,557,000
1933	521,685,000

If, now, the decrease in our imports has been due to the Tariff Act of 1930, how does it follow that there has been a relatively greater decrease in the importation of articles that enter this country free of duty? If the charge be true that the decrease in imports can be traced to the Tariff Act of 1930, then we should expect that there would be a greater decrease in the value of dutiable articles than there would be in the value of articles entering free of duty, and yet the reverse is actually the case.

DEPRESSION DECREASES IMPORTS

Of course, the figures that are available prove conclusively that the decrease in our imports, or, indeed, in our foreign trade generally, has not been due to the operations of the Tariff Act of 1930, but are solely the effects of a world-wide depression. It has come about because of a falling off in our quantity of goods consumed.

Mr. HATFIELD. Madam President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. CARAWAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HEBERT. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Does not the value in one period as compared with another also enter into the computation?

Mr. HEBERT. Yes; very much so, indeed.

Mr. HATFIELD. For instance, in 1929 the index value was 125.5, as compared with an index value for 1933 of 67.5.

Mr. HEBERT. There is no question that the decrease in the value of commodities has had its effect upon the value as reported in our import statistics.

The quantity of silk, wool, jute, and burlap has fallen off enough to be noticeable. The same thing is true of the items of rubber, sugar, and vegetable-oil group, which, as we know, are free of duty except some certain kinds of oil upon which we have recently imposed a tariff. The same thing is true of other items including perfumes from France and fine textiles from England. The decline in imports in plate glass from Belgium merely represents a decline in the activities in the building industry in the seaboard cities of our own country.

I come now to the very point raised by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] in his inquiry propounded to me. A combination of the decline in price and a decline in consumption accounts for practically 100 percent of the falling off in value of importations, both of articles on the free list and those on the dutiable list. Had there been a sudden and very marked decrease in imports of dutiable articles after the enactment of the Tariff Act of 1930, then there might have been some argument to support the charge that the higher rates were responsible for that decrease. The truth of the matter is that under the act of 1930 rates on industrial commodities were raised to a very limited degree, and that 95 percent of all increases in duties provided in that law affected commodities of agricultural origin. In fact, that law imposes average duties of about 16 percent of the value of all imports, both free and dutiable. This represents an increase of 5.2 percent over the Fordney-McCumber Act, which it succeeded, but represents a lower level compared to many former tariff laws. For example, the level under the McKinley Act was 23 percent; the Wilson Act, 20.9 percent; the Dingley Act, 25.8 percent; the Payne-Aldrich Act, 19.3 percent.

Approximately 66 percent of all goods imported from abroad are admitted to this country duty free. In comparison it is to be observed that preceding tariff laws admitted a much smaller proportion of imports without the imposition of tariff duties. Under the McKinley law the proportion was 52.4 percent; under the Wilson law, 49.4 percent; under the Underwood law of 1913, which placed almost all agricultural products on the free list, the average was from 60 percent to 73 percent.

Increases provided by the law of 1930 were made largely on behalf of agricultural interests of the country. The Tariff Commission reported in 1931 that of all increases that were made in this law, 93.73 percent were upon products of agricultural origin and 6.25 percent upon commodities of strictly nonagricultural origin.

The average rate upon agricultural raw materials was increased from 38.10 percent to 48.92 percent, whereas the increase on dutiable articles was, on the average, from 31.2 percent to 34.31 percent.

There were approximately 3,300 dutiable items in the Fordney-McCumber Act, which became a law in the year 1922. Of these, 890 were increased in the Hawley-Smoot Act, 234 were decreased, and 2,170 remained untouched.

It has been repeatedly charged, both in the public prints and by spokesmen for the Democratic administration, that the rates in the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act are higher than those imposed by foreign countries. Figures compiled by the Department of Commerce and other Federal Government agencies indicate clearly that a number of foreign countries impose higher duties than those provided in the existing law in our own country. For example, the import duties on wheat coming into the United States are fixed at 42 cents per bushel; the rate in France is 85 cents per bushel; and only recently, in fact, in a Paris dispatch printed in the New York Times under date of the 27th instant, bearing a Paris date line, the statement is made that the wheat tariff of France has been increased to about $1.57 a bushel. Last July a law was passed in that country establishing a minimum domestic price of about $2.07 a bushel.

Mr. HATFIELD. Madam President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HEBERT. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Then the high tariffs in foreign nations are made largely so that those nations may become self-sufficient in the production of the necessities of life, such as wheat, sugar, chemicals, and so forth. Is not that true?

Mr. HEBERT. That is my understanding. In my travels through France in 1931 I was informed by men in the government departments there that, because of protection afforded to the wheat growers of France, there was a sufficient quantity produced to provide for the necessary requirements of that country without importations from abroad. Following out that policy, I gather from the dispatch to which I have just referred that the production of wheat has increased in France to such a point that they not only will not need any importations from abroad but they will place an embargo against any importation of that commodity.

Mr. HATFIELD. The cost to the consumer possibly would be less than the price they would be required to pay if they imported the wheat.

Mr. HEBERT. I do not know how that has operated. I do know, and I have made the observation in the course of my remarks, that only last July a law was enacted in France establishing a minimum domestic price of approximately $2.07 per bushel for wheat. It occurred to me that possibly that was rather a high price for wheat even in France. It is much higher than realized by the wheat farmers of this country.

The article to which I have referred added that France had left the ranks of wheat-importing nations and joined those of exporting nations. Such nations as Canada and Argentina, the article said, should abandon all hope of resuming wheat exports to France. Of course, if that is true in respect of Canada and Argentina, it must be equally true in respect of the United States.

The United States imposes a duty on importations of bacon of $3.25 per hundredweight as compared with a duty of between $11 and $12 imposed by France.

Under United States law, the duty on importation of pig iron is $1.12½ per ton; most other countries listed in the studies made by the Department of Commerce indicate that this is the lowest duty imposed by any country. They range from the figure I have quoted as applying to the United States to $33 per ton imposed by Mexico. Canada has a duty of $2.50 per ton.

The United States has a 10-percent duty on the import value of shoes coming into this country, while France has a duty of 15 percent; Germany imposes a duty of 60 cents per pair; Italy 38 cents per pair and 15 percent of their value; Canada 35 percent of their value, while Australia imposes a duty of 90 percent of their value.

LABOR, AGRICULTURE, INDUSTRIES, SUPPORT EXISTING TARIFF LAW

Demands of Democratic politicians for downward revision of our tariff rates have found no response among those most directly concerned—the farmers, the workers, and the industries of our country. On the contrary, the farm organizations whose representatives in Washington declared the Hawley-Smoot Act to be the most equitable tariff law ever passed in behalf of agriculture, have steadfastly resisted the appeal for downward revision. The leading associations of manufacturers have warned the country that any successful political revision undertaken by the Democrats would mean greatly increased economic distress.

Mr. HATFIELD. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HEBERT. Certainly.

Mr. HATFIELD. Can the Senator state how long the high tariff rates he has mentioned have been in effect in those European countries?

Mr. HEBERT. They were in existence in most instances long before the 1930 tariff law was enacted in the United States.

Mr. HATFIELD. Can the Senator say whether or not they had been in existence before the enactment of the Fordney-McCumber law or the Underwood-Simmons law?

Mr. HEBERT. A number of schedules of those foreign-tariff laws and some of the schedules to which I have already referred were in force back in those times. In more recent times, it has seemed to me, in anticipation perhaps of the action which it was believed might be taken by Congress at the behest of the President, tariff duties have gone skyrocketing in a number of countries in Europe, I assume for the purpose of trading. I do not know, but that is the conclusion at which I have arrived.

Mr. HATFIELD. Then, it cannot be accurately or truthfully said that the Smoot-Hawley tariff law of 1930 excited the high-tariff rates to which the Senator is referring and which are in existence in Europe.

Mr. HEBERT. Most of them were in existence long before the passage of the Smoot-Hawley Act.

Mr. HATFIELD. Is it not true that in Europe they have been enforcing embargoes against certain products of which they are proud and which they are trying to develop in those countries to the point where they may become self-sufficient? In order to protect those industries, they have embargoed, have they not, the importation of like products from other countries?

Mr. HEBERT. That is a very natural thing for a nation to do. It is not my notion that foreign nations are getting to the point of magnanimity where they would admit our products to the detriment of their own. I have never reached the conclusion that foreign countries were buying our commodities because they wanted to do some favor to us. They bought them and they will buy them in future whenever it is to their advantage to do so. When they can buy them more advantageously at a lower price than they can produce them themselves, then possibly we will get their trade, and not otherwise. We need not be looking for it whenever they can produce that which they need for their own consumption in their own land.

The representatives of labor organizations have not only resolutely defended the present tariff law, but also have appealed to the Tariff Commission for increased duties on commodities which cannot meet foreign competition at prevailing rates of duty.

The reason for labor's approval of the Hawley-Smoot Act is found in the comparison of average weekly wages paid in key industries in this country as compared to those in the leading competing foreign countries. Here are some significant comparisons prepared by the Department of Labor:

To cite but a few illustrations, the average weekly wage in the iron and steel industry in this country in 1931 was $20.35; in France in 1930, the figures for which are the last available, it was $9 per week; in Germany, $12.39; and in Great Britain, $13.83.

In the cotton-textile industry the average weekly wage in the United States in 1931 was $13.38; in Great Britain it was $9.17 in 1928, according to the last available data; in Germany it was $9.07 in 1930, according to the last available data.

In the woolen and worsted goods the average weekly wage in the United States in 1931 was $20.85; in 1928 it amounted in Great Britain on the average to $9.59; and in Germany it was $9.07.

In the boot and shoe industry in the United States in 1931, the average weekly wage was $19.27; in Great Britain in 1928, the last available figures, it was $10.30; and in France in 1930, $6.84.

In the women's clothing industry, the average weekly wage in the United States in 1931 was $22.16; but in France, our strongest competitor, the average weekly wage in 1930 was $8.56, or just a little more than one-third of what it was in this country.

During the year 1931, we imported more than $40,000,000 in value of cotton manufactures, including yarns. In approximately the same period, 520 concerns which manufacture cotton goods in this country reported to the Department of Labor that they had had to dispense with thousands of workers. While we were importing woolen manufactures valued at $23,000,000, thousands of our workers in the textile woolen industry were out of employment. Again, more than 10,000 employees in the leather, boot, and shoe industry lost their jobs, while $22,000,000 of American money was paid for the purchase of imported leather goods.

Thus we see from authentic and unimpeachable sources that the tariff has had little, if any effect, upon the volume of imports of commodities into this country. The facts are plain for anyone to see. We have imported that volume which our people could afford to buy. Not alone has that been true of imports, but it is likewise true of our consumption of commodities produced in our own country. Even the consumption of staple foodstuffs—bread and meat—has decreased as a result of the depression, and very materially, too. Surely it cannot be maintained that this decrease is due to high tariff duties. It would be equally true if there were no tariff laws; and no amount of tariff tinkering will alleviate that particular situation. It will improve just as it has improved many times in the past when, after a depression, confidence has been restored, and we return to normal conditions.

BILL AIMED SOLELY AT INDUSTRY

To my mind, there can be but one way to put into operation the provisions of such a bill as we are now considering. Clearly, there is no intention, nor would there be any purpose, in changing the rates on agricultural commodities. Of these we produce more than we can consume, and there is no reason why under the circumstances we should not maintain our home markets for our own agriculturists, just as we have in the past. In fact, it has been repeatedly stated that our existing tariffs on agricultural commodities are for the most part inoperative. It follows, then, that whatever changes are to be effected will relate to industrial products; and it may be of more than passing interest to consider the results of the studies made by the Tariff Commission from the enactment of the Tariff Act of 1930 down to the present time.

In the statement of Mr. Robert Lincoln O'Brien, Chairman of the Tariff Commission, made before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and reported at page 72 of the printed hearings, there appears a summary of the articles upon which the Tariff Commission has reported to the President, and the action looking to a change in duty in every instance. In this summary Mr. O'Brien lists 111 articles. In 20 instances the Tariff Commission recommended increases in duties, and in 26 instances it recommended decreases; in the remainder of the cases, 65 in number, no change was recommended and none was made.

During the past year, when forces other than the tariff law itself came into operation because of the world-wide conditions and the enactment of the National Industrial Recovery Act, I am advised on reliable authority that in only two instances have the Tariff Commission recommended a decrease in duties. In every other case which came to their attention for study they have found an increase in tariff duties to be imperative in order to protect our industries against importations from abroad.

Of course, it is natural that this should be so, because under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act it is a well-known fact that requirements imposed upon industry have very materially raised the cost of production, and have made it impossible for our industrialists to compete with importations from abroad without not only maintaining our tariff duties but increasing them in a number of instances.

I repeat, the only way in which the administration could bring into operation the provisions of the pending bill would be to sacrifice some of our industries, probably resulting in more unemployment among our own people, for some supposed benefit to accrue to us in our trade relations with foreign countries. Beyond the shadow of a doubt it will be necessary to abandon the existing formula of equalizing the cost of production here and abroad. I venture to say that those of our citizens engaged in industry in this country are not apt to look with favor upon any program which contemplates the destruction of some of our industries for the benefit of citizens abroad.

SECRETARY WALLACE AND THE RECIPROCAL TARIFF

In a speech which I delivered here on April 9 last, I referred to the testimony of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace on the subject of inefficient industries. I called attention to the fact that for the first time—and I think the only time—an administration representative has singled out an industry which is to be subjected to the operations of the reciprocal tariff, and hence to be marked for extension, Secretary Wallace referred to the lace industry, which had its origin in this country in the State which I have the honor to represent in part in this body. Since then, I have had a great deal of correspondence both with those managing the lace industry and with citizens of my State and other parts of the country employed therein.

Among these is one of my fellow townsmen, who is himself a large investor in some of the lace mills in Rhode Island, Col. Patrick H. Quinn, formerly Democratic national committeeman from Rhode Island, and for 4 decades one of the outstanding members of the Democratic Party of my State. Colonel Quinn and I have always been on opposite sides in politics. He has always been as fervent a Democrat as I have been a constant advocate of the Republican cause. I know no one acquainted with him who will question his sincerity in politics or his intense interest in the cause of the Democratic Party in his State and in the Nation.

COLONEL QUINN'S STATEMENT

When the reciprocal tariff bill which we are now considering was before the Committee on Finance of the Senate and hearings were then being had, Colonel Quinn appeared to oppose its passage, and this is what he said:

Mr. QUINN. I appreciate this opportunity to appear today, Mr. Chairman, as a lace manufacturer, because I understand that the industry was reached yesterday, and Mr. Phillips made a very complete talk upon our reasons for being against this bill.

I will try not to repeat anything that he said or read any part of my speech; but because of a question that Senator KING asked this morning of one of the speakers, I should like to put this paragraph into the record.

The Senator referred to a statement of the President, which he made during the campaign:

"I have advocated the lowering of tariffs by negotiation with foreign countries, but I have not advocated, and I will never advocate a tariff policy which will withdraw protection from American workers against those countries which employ cheap labor or who operate under a standard of living which is lower than that of our own great laboring group."

That is the statement of President Roosevelt on October 30, 1932.

I have a good deal of money that I was able to earn as a lawyer invested in two lace mills down in Rhode Island. The lace industry was introduced into Rhode Island at the suggestion of Mr. Shepard, who was consul general in Italy under Grover Cleveland. It lingered along for a number of years, amounting to little until 1909 or 1910, when the Payne-Aldrich bill invited the industry to expand by putting lace machines on the free list. And now it has grown so that it produces one third of all the lace consumed in this country, and that, I say, is not an inefficient industry, and the only thing that could be classed as inefficient about it is that the wages paid in France to the employees of the industry there are less than one-third what we pay our employees for the same lines of work in this country.

Senator KING. With your superior machinery and your superior technique, and your more efficient labor and your greater use of electrical energy for man-power—aside from that, I presume, however, that your output per man is very much greater than in France.

Mr. QUINN. I doubt that very much, Senator. I know that used to be our argument on the Democratic stump—that the American workman produced so much more than the workman abroad. Because most of our workmen in this industry—that is, the key men who run the lace machines—are Frenchmen from France, and Englishmen from Nottingham.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean that the general rule would not pertain to the lace industry.

Mr. QUINN. I think that is true.

Senator HEBERT. May I ask a question there, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly, Senator.

Senator HEBERT. Have we ever produced any lace machines in this country?

Mr. QUINN. No; they attempted in Massachusetts to produce a couple down there. A machine concern attempted to build, and did build, I think, two or three machines, but they were not a success. These machines are all imported from France and England.

Senator HEBERT. So that the industry here uses the same machines as they do in Calais or in Nottingham?

Mr. QUINN. Exactly.

Senator HEBERT. Working fewer hours than they do over there?

Mr. QUINN. Yes; fewer hours, and for less than one third of the wages.

Now, I stand exactly with the President where he stood on this question in October 1932. In the town where Senator HEBERT and I live, within 3 miles of our homes, there are a half dozen of these lace mills whose pay rolls turned out into that rather small community amount from $12,000 to $15,000 a week. It is a very considerable item.

This is an important industry in Rhode Island. Why do we talk so much about lace? Because we have been warned. Because utterances have been made that we ought to have a fair warning in advance that something is going to happen to us. We have been picked out as one of those industries for the execution.

If that had come only from the Secretary of Agriculture, after listening here all day, I would not have been so fearful about it; but I listened with great attention to Senator COSTIGAN last Saturday afternoon in his debate with Mr. Oscar Villard, which was the first debate I ever attended where the speakers on both sides were in favor of the affirmative. But Senator COSTIGAN named a half dozen to 10 industries, and he named the lace industry, and he named it incorrectly; and I think when a man of Senator COSTIGAN'S experience on the Tariff Commission has a wrong idea of what the lace industry is, that it would be strange to some of you other Senators, too.

He talked about the hand-made lace industry. There is nothing of the kind. There is no hand-made lace industry in this country. It is a machine-made lace industry.

I listened with great attention to Senator COSTIGAN, and if you were to take all the industries that Senator COSTIGAN listed as inefficient and unimportant and having, as he said, a protection of 100 and 105 and 110 percent and list them together, the trading value would be practically nil.

Now, may I say in closing, I want to make my protest as broad as I can. I refrain from saying anything more about the lace industry. I want to protest, Mr. Chairman, against the passage of this bill on a broader scope than that of a lace manufacturer. The bill is wrong in principle and will not work in practice, and I want to call to your attention—both of you Senators being lawyers—I think I have followed these hearings fairly well, and therefore I am not astray when I say to you that of all the witnesses who have appeared here as proponents of this bill before your committee, only one, I think, Mr. Graham, of the automobile industry, was what we would call in court a witness testifying to facts.

Who else has appeared in favor of this bill? The opinion of expert witnesses buried my dear good friend Cordell Hull, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Agriculture, and men of that type, Mr. Former Secretary Stimson—they have simply expressed to you the opinion which I say to you is nothing more than a hope that the passage of this bill will do some good.

I think it will do harm. I do not feel, as that speaker from Texas and one other gentlemen, speaking for the wool industry, this morning suggested, that there might possibly be an apology from a Democrat talking here for protection. That is not my understanding at all. I know of no organized Democratic movement in favor of anything contrary to protection. I have attended every Democratic National Convention since 1900, beginning with that one, except one, and it is only a difference in degree between the two parties.

Senator KING. You mean on the tariff question?

Mr. QUINN. On the tariff question. The only prominent statesman or distinguished economist in this country of whom I have read this year who has gone on record in favor of free trade is Professor Tugwell, and when we find Professor Tugwell fathering the statement that he believes—I am not pretending to quote him, but in substance—no industry that required the protection of a tariff had any business in this country, and, on the other hand, when we find the Secretary of Agriculture spotting out this industry and that industry, which includes my industry, and saying, "You ought to be given fair warning", you can understand, Mr. Chairman, that it creates a disturbance in the section of the country where I live.

I think it would be bad for the country, and in answer to my good Democratic friends who talked here this morning, apparently they belong to the same party with me, and I never belonged to any other party, but I believe it will be bad for the country and worse for the Democratic Party if you pass this bill, and I appeal to the administration now in power in Congress, and I appeal to the men who have the large working majority in both Houses of this country, not to try this upon us.

It is asked for; why? My answer to that will be my closing, Mr. Chairman. Secretary Hull and those other distinguished gentlemen who come here and ask for this, put it upon what ground? The ground of emergency. Not one of them has said that this thing is good inherently. They ask that it be tested. They say that a great emergency has fallen upon us. One of the Senators interrupted Secretary Hull the other day with a question, and when he did, the only answer he could give for it was that the day of emergencies required extraordinary remedies.

Well, if those gentlemen were contrasting present-day conditions with conditions previous to October 1929, I would agree with them that there was an emergency and an extraordinary condition, but there is no extraordinary condition today compared with when President Roosevelt uttered that paragraph that I have inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Senator HEBERT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask Mr. Quinn a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Senator HEBERT. This question is prompted by a letter which I received this morning from a man I do not know. I assume from the tenor of his letter that he is probably an importer of laces. He made the statement that it seemed to him that the inefficiency of the lace industry was due to watered stock.

You are familiar with the conditions in Rhode Island, where you and I live. You are one of the investors in the stock of some mills down there. Will you make a statement as to whether or not there is any watered stock in those mills?

Mr. QUINN. It is absolutely ridiculous to charge the lace industry with having watered stock. There are only two families in this country, the Bromleys, of Philadelphia, and the Goffs, of Pawtucket, R.I., who could be classed as rich people. All the other lace mills are owned by people of very ordinary means.

The mills in your town and mine have around 150 or 200 stockholders.

Senator HEBERT. I understand some of them were workmen in the cotton mills who invested their savings in that stock.

Mr. QUINN. Yes, sir; and not a few of them were workers in the lace mills themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Under date of the 26th instant I received from Colonel Quinn a letter which I feel I ought to read to the Senate, because of what he says and because of his expressed desire to have his opinion recorded on this measure, as to the effects it will have, before the mistake is made of enacting it into law. I read:

QUINN, KERNAN & QUINN,
Providence, R.I., May 26, 1934.

Hon. FELIX HEBERT,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am sending you a copy of Advertising Age of December 2, 1933, containing a double-page advertisement of Wallace's Farmer and Iowa Homestead, which I understand to be the papers owned and published by Secretary Wallace and his family.

This advertisement ought to be given a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD before the final vote is had on the pending tariff bill, so that the Democrats of the Senate and of the country may know just what Secretary Wallace's connections and views are when he is at home in Iowa.

In an effort to extend the circulation of the Wallace newspapers, it will be noted that he is promising his home State great things. The following quotations from the advertisement in question are a delightful expression of disinterested statesmanship:

"The flow of Federal cotton money started business booming in the South. What Federal funds will do for Iowa business is evident from the fact that Iowa, from the corn-hog contract benefits alone, will get 10 times as much as the average cotton State got from the cotton bonus, where 16 States shared $111,000,000."

And again, this disinterested (?) adviser has this choice morsel to offer in support of a larger circulation for his newspapers:

"Uncle Sam has been dotting up maps of the United States to show you where the corn-hog benefits go. The maps below show what he has done to Iowa. You can't see a dot for the dots."

As you well know, Senator, I never voted anything but the Democratic ticket. If I have got to start in now taking my political economy from Republican sources, I want some choice in my selection of Republican mentors.

If the pending tariff bill passes the Senate and if the President of the United States could be persuaded by men of the type of mind of Secretary Wallace to reduce the tariff on New England and northern products 50 percent (something that I hesitate to believe will be possible) the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture would have succeeded in raising more hell in this part of the country than hogs in Iowa. The reciprocal tariff bill, if passed, will be known as one of the great mistakes in the history of legislation, and I want my humble opinion to have been recorded before this mistake is made.

Very truly yours,

PATRICK H. QUINN.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand a copy of the advertisement to which Colonel Quinn made reference. It appeared in the Advertising Age, issue of December 2, 1932, and is signed "Wallaces' Farmer and Iowa Homestead, Des Moines, Iowa." The advertisement reads:

"MONEY SPOTS" CAN BE SPOTTED!—CAN BE BOUNDED GEOGRAPHICALLY!

The new fluid, cash money, that is being poured into the money spots can be measured accurately.

Alert sales management can know where—exactly where—there is enough cash, fluid-traveling, unfrozen money, to give bountiful response to sales effort!

Isn't that the simple solution of today's sales problems? Not to be overwhelmed by national or world conditions but to put aggressive sales effort in the cash-money spots—so easily, accurately spotted?

Uncle Sam has been dotting up maps of the United States to show you where the corn-hog benefits go.

The maps below show what he has done to Iowa. You can't see a dot for the dots.

$300,000,000 FOR IOWA FARMERS FROM CORN AND HOGS

The total of sales of old and new corn, corn rentals, corn loans, hog bonus, and hog sales for the next 14 months should reach a total of $300,000,000 for Iowa farmers from hogs and corn alone. Of this amount, approximately $100,000,000 will be in the form of funds advanced by the Federal Government through corn loans and benefits on corn-hog contracts. The balance will come from sales of corn and hogs on the market at the higher prices resulting from the corn-hog program.

This means over $3,000,000 per county from corn and hogs. Think what this means in spending power.

This new cash money being poured into Iowa between November 1933 and February 1935 makes Iowa the outstanding cash-money spot of America.

FEDERAL FUNDS BOOM BUSINESS

The flow of Federal cotton money started business booming in the South. What Federal funds will do for Iowa business is evident from the fact that Iowa, from the corn-hog contract benefits alone, will get 10 times as much as the average cotton State got from the cotton bonus, where 16 States shared $111,000,000.

Cash is now flowing to Iowa farmers. The first actual corn loan at 45 cents a bushel was made to a Pocahontas County, Iowa, farmer on Friday afternoon, November 24.

The spending power is here. It remains for the alert sales managers to take advantage of this extraordinary sales opportunity.

Don't overlook the fact that the income of the average Iowa farmer is approximately twice that of the income of the Nation's average farmer.

WALLACES' FARMER AND IOWA HOMESTEAD SUPREME IN IOWA FARM MARKET

Wallaces' Farmer and Iowa Homestead has a total circulation of 260,000. It is read in 92 percent of the farm homes of Iowa.

This means that every hour of the day, 9 out of every 10 farmers who pass your dealers' stores—all possible customers—are long-term subscribers to Wallaces' Farmer and Iowa Homestead, and are familiar with the brand names of shoes, clothing, foodstuffs, machinery, auto accessories—everything that appears on its advertising pages. To get turnover of your product in this major market, you must reach the major number of farmers—the 9 out of 10 who read Wallaces' Farmer and Iowa Homestead.

POST OFFICE COUNT CIRCULATION PUTS FULL TRUTH IN ADVERTISING

Stock turn-over, as influenced by advertising, is strictly dependent upon a coverage in a dealer's own particular locality adequate to create a buying preference at his own retail counter.

Post-office count is a paper's proof that its circulation is uniform and adequate in all parts of its territory to influence business for every dealer.

The farm paper that dares to give a post-office count of circulation must have uniform, unspotted circulation in every community and locality in its territory! No thin circulation in any community!

Wallaces' Farmer and Iowa Homestead offers the only dominant coverage in this exceptional farm market, and demonstrates it by post-office count, which, in the hands of your salesmen, gives conviction to Iowa dealers that advertising in Wallaces' Farmer and Iowa Homestead is of immediate value to them in their own communities.

Write for special literature on corn-hog benefits.

WALLACES' FARMER AND IOWA HOMESTEAD,
Des Moines, Iowa.

INCREASED UNEMPLOYMENT WOULD RESULT FROM PASSAGE OF BILL

In the light of these facts, what, may I inquire, is to be accomplished by reciprocal agreements which, if made effective, must inevitably result in making more severe the competition of the lower wage scales of other countries?

Every one of these tariff treaties will make more easy the importation of some articles which will displace some of our workers and prevent the reemployment of some of the ten millions of our unemployed.

Given the same hours of labor, the same scale of wages, and the same conditions of employment, I venture the assertion that our manufacturers could compete with the world. But who among us is willing to say that our American working men are overpaid, admitting their wages are, on the average, twice those which prevail in other countries? Shall we be heard to say that the American standard of living shall be reduced to the level of the countries with which we are in competition?

In our search for foreign markets for a mere 7-percent excess production over our annual consumption are we to jeopardize the 93 percent and make that available to the workmen of other lands? Are we to embrace the shadow and let fly the substance? My reply is that we shall do those very things the moment we enter into trade agreements such as I am led to believe are contemplated.

Let us assume the President, if given this power, will use it judiciously. No one doubts that. But even its judicious use will not remove its dangerous implications. Not only the exercise of such power may destroy our industries but the mere fact that the power exists is in itself ominous, since it may dry up the sources of capital essential to the continued existence of any business enterprise. Once let it be even rumored that an agreement affecting any particular industry is under consideration and immediately capital will flee from it and its ultimate extinction will not be long deferred.

Capital cannot be secure under such conditions. Industry cannot thrive under such an incubus. With such indecision, such uncertainty, such a disturbance of the existing order, recovery must of necessity be long deferred.

RHODE ISLAND WORKERS WOULD BE IMPERILED

I am not now nor have I ever been engaged in industrial pursuits. However, I am not unfamiliar with the conditions surrounding industry, particularly in Rhode Island. I was reared in the shadow of our cotton mills. Five generations of my people have lived in close proximity to them. Within sight of my home are a score of industrial plants, some of them established more than a century ago. Many of the workers in those plants have spent a lifetime of endeavor there. Some of them were my boyhood companions. I still number them among my friends.

They are my neighbors. They have prospered, many of them; they have reared their families and educated them out of their earnings. I know something of the sacrifices they have had to make through the years. Among them are large numbers of home owners—modest homes—upon which they have lavished their tender care and in which they have invested their all. Most of them could not now change the habits of a lifetime and seek employment in other lines if, as I am convinced, the effect of the pending bill will be to destroy their present means of livelihood.

What I say about the conditions in my immediate neighborhood applies with equal force in all parts of Rhode Island, and, indeed, throughout New England and the industrial East. In my own State we are essentially industrial. Our farming is negligible, though by no means inconsequential. Our dairy herds are among the finest in the world and our truck farming is carried on extensively, but few cereal crops are harvested for the market.

All of these people have honored me with their confidence and friendship through the years. If I were in the course of my service here, by my official acts, to do that which I firmly believe would jeopardize their future well-being, I would be violating that confidence and outraging that friendship which I have treasured for so long. Whatever eventuates I shall not do that. Believing as I do that the passage of this measure will not be conducive to their best interests but will be detrimental to the people of our country, I shall oppose it.

Let it be observed that we have as many factories, as many farms, capable of producing as many of the things we wear and use and consume as we ever had. We have as many people ready to buy these products just as they did in times of prosperity. The manufacturers are ready to produce if they can find a market. Our citizens will be as ready to purchase as they ever were if we can ever dispel that fear, that lack of confidence which holds them in its grasp.

It is far better to adhere to those forms which we know so well—to have faith in our country and its future, to live in the hope which I believe will not be long deferred that this cloud of depression which has hovered over the entire world for so long will soon be dispelled. It is our task to help restore confidence in this hour of need rather than to dissipate our efforts and waste our patrimony and mortgage our future in a vain effort to remake the world.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

"THE SLIPPERY DEAL"

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, America is a patient Nation. In the name of emergency her citizens have submitted without protest to an unending series of uneconomic experiments ranging from interference with private enterprise, destruction of competition, the lifeblood of business, disorganization of established institutions, such as our air mail, to usurpation of functions allotted by the Constitution.

"Give the President a chance", the American people were told. And they gave him his chance. "Do not criticize", they were admonished; "that is unpatriotic." So, in spite of grave misgiving, people held their peace, hoping against hope that fine phrasing meant sound thinking, and that back of the wild and reckless hue and cry for change—any change—was some plan, some goal that would mean relief. The resulting state of confusion, bewilderment, dislocation, and danger should awaken even the blind followers of the blind, the mouthers of quick opinion.

On one hand, they claim the emergency to be passed; yet, under the guise of a war on depression, they seek to make permanent the drastic supervision, the flagrant interference with individual liberty and initiative, the violation, and repudiation of the Constitution, "the greatest piece of work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man", as Gladstone said.

From a small nation, basing its faith on the right doctrines of the Constitution, we have grown to a mighty nation. If we throw away this mainstay of our greatness, we shall go the way of other great nations which, in a spirit of folly, replaced stalwart principles with experimentation.

It is useless to try to crowd down the throats of our people any program which fails of popular support. Rumblings are growing, and if they are not heeded patience will turn to fury, and the revolution which the administration boasts of will be upon us.

WE BELIEVED IN AMERICA

For 150 years we had protection. We were nationalists. We believed in America first. We became a great nation on the principles laid down in our Constitution. We had relations with other nations, but we kept our hands out of their politics. Ninety-five percent of the automobiles, the bathtubs, the radios, the aids to comfortable and luxurious living were used within our own borders. By protecting our laborers from foreign goods our standard of living became the envy of all nations up to the time Woodrow Wilson "kept us out of war" by dragging us into it as fast as he could. We did not need to go into that war; we should never have gone in; but the international bankers, who elect our Presidents, wanted us in; so Wilson drafted the soldiers and in we went. The riot of extravagance in the conduct of that war, the spendthrift loans to Europe which they today repudiate, were the essence of today's depression.

Beginning with Wilson there has been a constant fight to drag us down to the level of Europe. Franklin Roosevelt's campaign was won on the theory that conditions could not be worse. The same personnel as in Wilson's time, the same wrecking crew that took us into that war and ruined us, are now in command.

The President's first "noble experiment" when he came into office was to look about for some means by which he could do something that he was not in anywise authorized to do, to look for some secret way of "slipping something over." He did not call it by its right name, a "slippery deal." He called it a "new deal." He did not have any war, as did his predecessor, Wilson; so he invented a war and called it the "war upon depression"—along the line of a war for democracy; you know, where the result of the war for democracy has rendered the world bereft of democracy and rampant with dictatorships.

He needed some show of lawful authority with which to quiet the people while he usurped power. So he instructed his Attorney General to find some pretense of authority, and the Attorney General promptly found a law passed during our foreign war "to make the world safe for democracy", and upon its pretended authority closed every bank in the country, to make sure we reached the bottom of desperation. What little courage and confidence were left were taken away.

The next deed was to kick the soldiers out of their hospitals and off the compensation rolls. The Republicans took care of the soldiers, gave them decent compensation and decent hospitalization, but the international bankers wanted to balance the Budget, so they took it off the soldiers and the poorly paid Government employees.

ROOSEVELT A DIRECTOR

Franklin D. Roosevelt was a director on the board of the International Bankers Association up to the time that he became Governor of New York, and through the International Bankers Association loans to the amount of $15,000,000,000 were arranged for foreign nations.

The international bankers cannot get back their money or interest on this $15,000,000,000 loan unless these foreign peoples can sell their goods to us.

Owing to his declaration in Baltimore that "it was preposterous to think of lowering the tariff on agricultural products", and owing to his announcing to the convention that had made it that he was for the Democratic platform 100 percent, it was hardly feasible that the people would understand if he immediately, with his subservient Congress, reduced the tariffs with 12,000,000 men out of work. So he and his banker friends, and big business generally, conceived the idea of starting the N.R.A.—the so-called "National Recovery Act", better known today as the "national ruin act." It was reported that Barney Baruch and his friends had established approximately 1,800 factories in foreign countries, and the Republican tariffs were a little too high for them to make in our market with cheap foreign labor enough money to satisfy their big money ideas. So, why not, under the guise of a war on depression, foist upon the people the National Racketeer Association and place Barney Baruch's partner, "Crack-up" Brigadier General Johnson, in charge of seeing that prices were raised to the level of 1926, while at the same time setting prices for agriculture at an average between 1909 and 1914? The farmers would not notice the disparity; and, if they did, what mattered?—since under the act he could control the newspapers, the radios, the movies, and every avenue of information that the people had, and could, with the taxpayers' money, fill their ears and minds with the propaganda that he desired.

So we have had the N.R.A.; Barney and his crowd have been profiting thereby, and our 12,000,000 still are unemployed; but the last of February the newspapers succeeded in getting into their code the guaranty of free speech, and they began again to feel their freedom and again began to print some of the news out of Washington that had been theretofore so carefully guarded. In only a few months, with some of the real news going to the people, the N.R.A. was shown up in its true light and is now known, as it was feared it would be by those who had given it serious thought, either on the Democratic or Republican side, to be a "flop"; and it became very evident to the administration and his international banker friends that if they were to get back the $15,000,000,000 loaned they must have some other scheme to advance now to the people, for further reduction of the tariff.

TARIFF PROTECTION IN DANGER

So we have before us this tariff bill, no doubt sent here to take the place of what was anticipated for the National Recovery Act. Now since the President's power over the newspapers and radios is slipping, he demands power to tamper secretly with the tariff. He has the power now to raise or lower the tariff 50 percent with the aid of the Tariff Commission, on the basis of known facts and figures. But that does not do. He must have absolute power within himself. Like all dictators, he wants secrecy. He does not want the people to know what he is about. It will not bear the light of day. He wants to act, regardless of facts and figures.

Since the N.R.A. is a failure, its life only a question of a few more months, its licensing power expiring in June, as a substitute for the help of the N.R.A. he proposes a tariff law, by which he can lower tariff rates by 50 percent at his own sweet will, to see that the international bankers, by whom he was elected, are taken care of. This, in effect, with the present 50 percent law in connection with the Tariff Commission, would give him power to raise or lower the tariff 75 percent.

All through the argument the statement is reiterated, "We must increase our foreign trade; we must let them sell to us so that they can pay us." Already things have been made easy for foreign manufacturers by reducing our week to 30 hours and increasing our prices under the N.R.A. To help the foreign nations pay the international bankers, the 12,000,000 unemployed are to be sacrificed. He purposes helping further by lowering the tariff and ruining our country and standard of living. This is to be done secretly. No one will know where the blow is to fall until it has fallen. What a power for political aggrandizement!

Of all our trade, 95 percent is within our borders. Foreign trade, even in our period of prosperity, was but 5 percent. It is patent that we shall never have recovery till we get back our own 95 percent. If Hoover had insisted on a protective tariff, after the depression hit us, amounting to an embargo, we should have been "out of the woods" of depression in 6 months, for in July wheat was $1.20 a bushel and all farm produce was selling for prices in proportion, as well as were industrial products. In 30 days after the N.R.A. went into effect, wheat fell to 75 cents a bushel, and everything else fell in proportion. Building stopped completely. Here in Washington alone in July nine hundred ninety thousand and some dollars in contracts were let. In 30 days they had fallen to $52,000, and have been falling ever since. This happened in the building industry and in every other industry all over the country. Even now, if nothing had been done, we would at least have been on a par of recovery with other countries, such as England, Canada, and Australia, which are on the high road to recovery, with balanced budgets and money in the treasury. But this eternal quest of the administration for more power, and still more power, together with its communistic regimentation, lock-stepping, individualism-crushing bills of doubtful remedy, has scared and will continue to scare every investing dollar.

The Democratic leaders who support and fight for the President's tariff bill are the same who, in Harding's and Hoover's administrations, condemned the flexible tariff as being unconstitutional.

This bill provides a strange parallel to the taxation without representation of George III, which led to the American Revolution and independence.

AGRICULTURE

Prof. H. J. Gramlich, in a speech delivered before the livestock feeders of Iowa in December, on the subject of the coconut-oil problem and American agriculture, disclosed the astounding fact that the importation of coconut oils from the Philippines has increased from 76,000,000 pounds in 1909 to about a billion pounds in 1933. And now, after killing the farmers' livestock and plowing under our cotton, the administration wants these coconut oils to come in free of duty.

On October 2, 1929, the issue now before us in the proposal to delegate tariff-making powers to the White House was before the Senate in the form of the so-called "Simmons amendment" to the flexible clause. The Simmons amendment—supported by a Senate majority composed of 33 Democrats and 14 Republicans—provided that changes of tariff duties proposed by the United States Tariff Commission should be submitted to Congress for approval instead of being directly approved by the President.

The question involved was, Should the legislative or the executive branch of Federal Government have direct power over tariff revision or, in effect, exercise priority of control over the Federal tax power?

FUNDAMENTAL CONFLICT

On that day, October 2, 1929, the chairman of the Senate Democratic committee, Senator Swanson, of Virginia, now Secretary of the Navy, delivered a four-page address reviewing the struggles of Anglo-Saxon nations from the day of Magna Carta down through the British and American Revolutions to the present day on the fundamental conflict between democracy and autocracy in control of the tax power. On page 4133 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Seventy-first Congress, first session, Senator Swanson described the issue thus:

> The issue now presented has been an issue from time immemorial. It is, Shall the taxing power in a nation be placed in the hands of one man or shall the people reserve that power to themselves and exercise it as their will and their judgment shall dictate? That is a conflict that has existed in the world since man became civilized. It is fundamental; it is far-reaching; it cannot be shirked. That is the issue here today, and no subterfuge, no sophistry can avoid that one specific issue.

Today, Mr. President, that issue is more specific and direct than it was in 1929. Five years ago it arose in the form of the power to approve a tariff revision proposed after public hearings and thorough investigation and findings by a Tariff Commission of experts. Today we are called upon to make a direct delegation of tariff-making powers and treaty contracts to the White House without Commission hearings and without advise and consent of the Senate. We are called upon to abdicate our treaty-making function and directly delegate to the White House the tariff-revision function without check and without even the knowledge of Congress.

The bill proposes an amendment of article I of the Constitution without submitting that amendment to the people.

CURSE OF MONARCHY

Our Secretary of the Navy, then Senator from Virginia and chairman of the Senate Democratic committee, called attention to a further danger, namely, that the power of the President to revise the tariff included the power to create monopolies for administration favorites. On the same page of the RECORD we find he said:

> What was the great curse of monarchy? It was the power on the part of the king to grant monopolies to a few to trade in England or in France or in Spain, as the case might be. One of the greatest curses of government until America was settled was the power given to monarchs to show favoritism, to bestow favors upon their particular friends and adherents, to make men rich or poor as the will of the monarch might dictate. In England privileges were given to favorites which resulted in monopolies in the woolen trade, the sugar trade, the cotton industry, and similar favors were bestowed in France and Spain. Court favorites were made rich by the monarchs who had it in their power to bestow such favors. That was one of the abuses denounced in our Declaration of Independence; it was one of the main grievances which resulted in wresting of Magna Charta from King John, for the King could bestow favors to the enrichment of his favorites.

Yet that very power, raised to a higher degree—the power which our Secretary of the Navy denounced in this Chamber as the curse of monarchy—we are asked today to delegate to the Executive by the very group of Senators for whom then Senator Swanson, their committee chairman, was the wise spokesman in 1929.

In support of the principle enunciated by their chairman, the Democratic members of the Senate Finance Committee presented a like indictment of Executive participation in the tariff-making power as an encroachment upon the powers of Congress.

Six of the Senators signing that indictment are the six senior Democratic members of the present Senate Finance Committee, including the chairman thereof, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. Other Democratic Senators of that committee are the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. Likewise, in 1929, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] signed the indictment as a member of the Finance Committee.

This is what those Senators said then, and the Constitution with reference to article I has not been amended since 1929 nor the Declaration of Independence expunged—except in slippery new-deal literature.

The following paragraph from that indictment of alleged Executive encroachment upon the powers of Congress occurs immediately after the Senate roll call—page 4150, Seventy-first Congress, first session, October 2, 1929. I am unable to believe that Senators have reversed their convictions on the fundamental gospel of the Republic in this brief space of time. I suspect that a number of the Senators here quoted believe at this hour as they believed then, and have no apologies to make, because none will be required of them. The issue as they saw it then was thus well stated—and I agreed with that statement then, as I do now. Permit me to quote:

> The question involved is one that in our opinion strikes at the very roots of constitutional government. It concerns the preservation unimpaired or the abandonment of the power of levying taxes by that branch of government which the forefathers agreed should alone be charged with that duty and responsibility.

In approval of this point of view and in defense of the power of Congress under the grant of article I, the Senate had just voted to support the Simmons amendment by a majority of 47 to 42. I was one of the Republican 14 who, with 33 Democrats, voted for the Simmons amendment. Let me further quote from the minority report of the Senate Finance Committee, of which the present chairman, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], was then a member, as now:

> Authority in the Executive to make the laws that govern the course of commerce through taxation is especially objectionable. It is an entering wedge toward the destruction of a basic principle of representative government, for which the independence of the country was attained and which was secured permanently in the Constitution.

Mr. President, can we find in American history a more admirable statement of the issue, couched in courteous though frank and logical terms, than the above statement of the issue today raised in this tariff bill introduced by the White House?

Then came the charge of secrecy. At that time the indictment drawn by Democratic Senators with reference to Executive secrecy was not particularly plain. Tariff revision under the flexible clause involved public hearings and published documents. Nevertheless, the fear of secrecy inspired a chapter of the Democratic minority report, from which I quote (p. 4151):

PROCESS HELD VIRTUALLY SECRET

> The principle is: Are taxation laws and their application to be made virtually in secret, whatever may be said about a limiting rule, or are they to be enacted by the responsible representatives of the people in the Congress, where public debate is held and a public record made of each official's conduct? * * * The arbitrary exercise of the taxing power, all the more dangerous if disguised and not obvious, in its basic character is tyranny.

Mr. President, by reason of the fundamental character of the issue involved, an issue upon which may hang the future destiny of the Republic, if Senators will read the following pages from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 2, 1929, they will find:

First. The speech of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Swanson], including the radio-broadcast address of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], pages 4132–4136, Seventy-first Congress, first session.

Second. The report on the investigation of the Tariff Commission by the Senators from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], from Maryland [Mr. Bruce], and from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], pages 4138–4139, ibid.

Third. The roll call on the Simmons amendment to the Smoot amendment, page 4150 of same, followed by the minority report of the Democratic members of the Senate Finance Committee, pages 4150–4151, all of October 2, 1929.

OVERTHROW OF REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT

In view of the historic fact that a majority of the Democratic Members of the present Senate held, and most logically maintained, that delegation of tariff-making powers to the Executive involved vital dangers, such as, monopoly, secrecy, and overthrow of representative government, I am sure that no Member of the present Senate majority would wish their well-considered utterances ignored now that the issue between executive and congressional control of the Federal tax power confronts us face to face.

I was on the Mount Vernon when it was torpedoed and 38 sailors were drowned or scalded to death. There was a hole in the side of the vessel as big as a small house, and in order to save the ship it was necessary to leave the air-tight compartments closed. It meant the death of the 38. Our Ship of State is in the same condition. We have been torpedoed. It is the international bankers who are in the airtight compartments. There are about the same number of them, 38. Our President is busy in interviews and over the radio making it appear he is for the 12,000,000 unemployed. But he is not. He is all for opening the ship to the waters of the sea. He would sink the country to save a fraction of 1 percent. We must have a change of captain. We must get somebody, somewhere, with courage to act, to forget the yells of the 38 and save the 130,000,000.

He cannot save his international bankers under the high protective tariff left by the Republicans, and for that reason he took the people's money and inaugurated the N.R.A. It was intended to mask all his actions, to work as a screen to censor newspapers, radios, and movies. Senators will remember that Dr. Wirt was to speak the other day over the radio. He could not get a station. Finally he found a little radio company who was willing to brave the administration's wrath, but not a telephone wire would serve him. As I said in the Senate on the 22d of February, former Senator George Moses was not allowed to speak on the subject, Back to Sanity. Whenever he touched on criticism of the administration they put the buzzer on, and this was done under the guise of the N.R.A. They spent $100,000 a day for advertising. Once, I am told, it reached $500,000 per day.

We read in the papers that Bernie Baruch's partner "Hooey" Johnson thinks it is time for another educational drive. More wasted millions!

FREE SPEECH SAVED

When the newspapers got free speech under the code, the President was as mad as a hornet. He struck back viciously, insinuating immorality of the press, and harping upon the elimination of child labor, as Senators will remember. I will warrant it was then he began to cogitate in earnest this usurpation of tariff power, for with this weapon his hand could be upon the throat of every business and farmer in the Nation, which, together with the collecting of the $15,000,000,000, would moreover furnish the great means of silencing opponents in the coming election.

Anyone knows child labor is not an issue. Nearly all the States have had that law for many years. The morals of the Nation are in no danger from the newspapers.

There is a bevy of propagandists, paid for by the people's money, who see to it that nothing gets to the people of which the administration does not approve. So sure are they of the obedience of a frightened and cowed press, whose license might have been suspended unless they had behaved, that a group of key women from Democratic headquarters at a luncheon, it was told to me, were preening their feathers over being able to counsel neighborhood groups to buy and read their local paper. If they could not afford to buy one each "subscribe in groups. We cannot be accused of partisan advice", these women gloated, "for surely it is not partisan to learn what your country is doing."

I have been told that since I dared to criticize Mrs. Roosevelt's interest in the furniture factory at Reedsville she threatens to withhold her news from any paper that gives me any mention.

This bevy of special writers and radio speakers are paid to twist, misquote, misstate with diabolical cleverness, to poison the wells of information.

FOGGY ILLUSIONS OF BRAIN TRUST

For example, when Silas Strawn made his courageous demand that Roosevelt give "a definite announcement that the emergency is over, and that there will be no more requests for emergency legislation and no more tinkering with the dollar", two characteristic bits of propaganda were inserted cunningly. One—

President Roosevelt is taking a pragmatic, businesslike view of export possibilities, and apparently does not intend to be stampeded by the outmoded dogmatism of theorists.

Yet every act and speech of Roosevelt's are but springes to catch woodcocks, his plans bred in the foggy illusions of "brain trust" dreamers, who have no foundation of fact and experience; and, as Silas Strawn well said:

I find difficulty in consenting to the abandonment of a scheme of government which for 150 years has made us happier and more prosperous than the people of any other nation, and the adoption of a daily portfolio of discordant experiments which seem impossible of being assembled into a new governmental machine.

The second misleading statement was:

There are influential men in the administration, like Secretary of State Cordell Hull, who would go along more or less with Strawn. * * * If protecting the American workingman from the competition of 5-cents-a-day worker in Japan, for example, is economic nationalism, then let the internationalists make the most of it.

A palpable characteristic weasel-worded attempt to cheat. Bernie Baruch and his fellows hire the 5-cents-a-day laborer and want the tariff barriers down so they can ship in their goods. Yet this statement would have us believe that Roosevelt, the second, is concerned with the welfare of the American laborer. Not one statement or action of Cordell Hull's shows him seeing eye to eye with Silas Strawn in his present enunciations. If we should go back when he spoke in Congress against the flexible tariff proposal of Hoover, there might be some comparison. He said, in effect, "No honest man would ask for this, and no President, however honest, should have it."

Impatient as always of criticism, indifferent to the grim discontent of the people, Roosevelt in his reply reverts to his threatening and secretive poison cup and dagger method of attack. He said:

The people as a whole will be impatient of those who complain and those who hold out false fears. It is time to stop crying "wolf" and to cooperate in working for recovery.

Again:

The Federal Government will continue its unceasing efforts to stimulate employment, increase American values, and bring about a more wholesome condition. Private business can and must take up the slack.

He ignores the information as to the real state of the country, the fatal results of the unceasing efforts of the meddling Government. He will not brook advice. The present program will be obstinately carried out despite calamities and despite protests of the people and the sounder men within his own party.

His every effort is to conceal from the people the true facts and to issue misleading high-sounding statements. Darrow's report on the N.R.A. is shelved. The Wirt inquiry was turned into a pillory for that honest patriot. He was prevented from bringing out his facts that a faction of the administration is seeking to bring about a social revolution, though it is common talk here in Washington and in the Government departments and all through the country. A group of workers in Miss Hildegarde Kneeland's department, present at the inquiry, stated that what Dr. Wirt said was mild compared to the talk they heard every day.

The discourteous treatment of Dr. Wirt and former Democratic Senator James A. Reed showed a narrow and partisan effort to smother the truth and prevent an honest hearing, to "crack down" on a man trying to render valuable public service. There was no attempt to call Donald Richberg, who said, "The revolution is already here." To add insult to injury, our jesting President nominates the dangerous radical, Rexford Tugwell, to an extra office which he creates, and raises him from $7,000 to $10,000 a year, in the face of the fact that this man has openly said for years that he does not believe in the Constitution and openly recommends its abolition; and yet with his tongue in his cheek he takes an oath, knowing as any man must know, and any court in the country having the facts before it would pronounce, that his action is perjury; and perjury in this instance is not only perjury but treason. In his new position, Tugwell can shape the destinies of our long-suffering farmers according to the principles and practices of Soviet Russia, on which he looks with such favor, and which he refers to so constantly.

Tugwell will make a perfect assistant to Secretary Wallace, who stated that regimented public opinion was a necessity. What does that mean but censorship of speech and press? He also said that "our people must change their attitude concerning the nature of men and the nature of human society", and referred to the "enduring social transformation, such as the 'new deal.'" Dr. Tugwell's book, Our Economic Society and Its Problems, advocates Government control of all production. It has the 1932 Socialist program printed. He has used his position to have this book circulated in American schools and colleges, perfectly proving Dr. Wirt's charges that the "brain trust" is sowing the seeds of slippery-deal revolution in the minds of our students.

Yet the President's only answer is to try to make a jest of these charges, and Dr. Wirt is insulted and browbeaten for saying what everybody knows.

George W. Christians, of Chattanooga, in a statement which has never been denied, admits he is the author of the statement that Roosevelt is to be the Kerensky of the revolution. Christians is president of the Red organization, the Crusaders for Economic Liberty, and of three subsidiaries, the Crusaders, or White Shirts, the American Fascists, and the Associated Groups for Economic Liberty.

He gives the following report of a conversation with Roosevelt in the presence of Raymond Moley at Warm Springs, Ga., December 1, 1932:

I pointed out to Mr. Roosevelt that Kerensky had been successful only until the Czar was removed—he failed because he was unable to reconcile the jealous elements of the revolution. * * *

I predicted that President Roosevelt would be the Kerensky of the new economic revolution, and that a stronger man, a Lenin, would arise and lead the masses to true liberty. * * * He couldn't close the wide gaps in American thought * * * and he would be succeeded by a dictator who could.

No leader has ever arisen to remain at the head of a government continuously during the three phases of a revolution, and I told Mr. Roosevelt so. Mr. Roosevelt listened patiently to me, and then replied, "Well, Oliver Cromwell did."

The only reward Dr. Wirt got for his heroic attempt to reveal actual happenings in Washington was stubborn official resistance, slander, and intimidation, just as did Colonel Lindbergh when he sought to remind the President that a fair trial was one of the requisites of our Government. The six witnesses called ganged up on Dr. Wirt, and testified to a whole-cloth denial, after they had a meeting to discuss what their testimony should be. Senator Reed, whose fearless patriotism has never been questioned, a member of the administration's own party, said, after the mock hearing—

If they will give me a committee that isn't gagged, I'll have no difficulty in proving that Dr. Tugwell and others in the Government are advocating doctrines which I regard as revolutionary in character. I don't know how far this movement is going in this country. I shudder when I think of the possibilities.

RUSSIAN COMMUNISM IN MINNESOTA

I could say to Senator Reed that one of the wide scopes of this slippery deal is that it has been incorporated in a Russian, communistic platform adopted by the Farmer-Labor Party of my State, whose object is to test public opinion in the State of Minnesota to ascertain if slippery-deal revolution is feasible in Minnesota in 1934, and, if so, to install it throughout the United States in 1936.

I surmise that the Farmer-Labor Governor of my State, who is the candidate for reelection upon this Russian, Bolshevik, communistic platform, is to be well taken care of in case this bold slippery-deal experiment fails; for the President told me last August that no political appointment would be made in Minnesota contrary to the Governor's wishes. In compliance with the administration's desires, the Governor strenuously tried, but failed, to put through a special session of Minnesota's Legislature a Minnesota ruin act, known as the "M.R.A." Accordingly, the Governor was made the head of the N.R.A. for Minnesota, and resigned that to become the head of the C.W.A. and the F.E.R.A., the Federal Emergency Relief Administration.

I predict that this test will fail, even with the Governor's immense war chest collected from office-holders' salaries, and other devious racketeering devices. He will undoubtedly collect heavy tribute from the pirates who are trying, through this experiment, to scuttle our Ship of State. If this program carries in Minnesota this fall it will be the first outpost captured in an attack upon every State in the Union. I pray, I hope it will fail, because the people of Minnesota are less than one-half of 1 percent illiterate; and even under the sinister secrecy of this administration and its censorship of every avenue of information they will be able to read between the lines.

In his new book, On Our Way, the President states:

> If it is a revolution, it is a peaceful one.

He makes the following statements, which are absolutely at variance with the facts:

> Some people have called our new policy "fascism." It is not fascism, because its inspiration springs from the mass of the people.

"Springs from the mass of the people." Where does he get that people championship? The Democratic platform, a solemn covenant with the people, upon which he was elected and which he approved by word of mouth before the convention when he said, "I am for this platform 100 percent", he has utterly repudiated. Not one plank of it has he carried out; and in that platform was not one inkling of what he has actually done. The only way this administration's actions spring "from the mass of the people" is like Dickens' artful dodger running with the crowd, chasing Oliver Twist, calling "'Thief! Thief!' and me with the wipe in me pocket."

The President again says:

> Rather than from a class or group or marching army.

It is said he is intending to arm and train his C.W.A. workers—a clever ruse of the President's to collect all the young blood of dissatisfaction in the country, including the Communists, into one great army whose leader is F. D. R. His benevolence and greatness is constantly dinned into them through speech, radio, and literature—

> Moreover, it is being achieved without a change in fundamental Republican method. We have kept faith in and with our traditional political institutions.

Yet he is working as fast as he can to arrogate to himself all the essential powers of the legislative and judiciary branches.

POWERS BEING FILCHED

Last session the President demanded and took from Congress and the judiciary, 77 powers, according to Garet Garrett. I do not know how many more have been and will be taken this session. Every bill is in itself a little dictatorship. Every bill contains some dark secret method of usurping absolute power, either in the hands of the administration or in some left- or right-arm trusty.

Democratic President Wilson advocated "open covenants, openly arrived at." This administration talks of open covenants, but every demand he makes upon Congress is for secret exercise of power under the guise of emergency—the drummed-up war on depression. Our Government, according to our Constitution, is a government of laws, not of men, not of despots, not of dictators. Our evolution should be in the open; and if we are to have revolution, it should be understood by the people what is being done, and their approval should be secured before its attempted accomplishment.

This administration has no mandate of the people to do what he is doing. Nobody knows the devious source of his insidious demands on Congress. The plot of revolution, or evolution as he terms it, is being hatched in the dark, under cover, under secrecy. If the people will elect an opposition House and Senate, they will kick over the boards and expose to the sunlight the slimy, crawling things beneath.

The President has departed completely from the policies of Washington and Jefferson and Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, Jackson, and Cleveland.

Again, he says in his book, On Our Way:

> Some people have called it "communism"; it is not that, either. It is not a driving regimentation founded upon the plans of perpetuating directorate which subordinates the making of laws and the processes of the courts to the orders of the Executive.

A direct denial of his aims and actions. Such bare-faced effrontery of American intelligence surely will meet its reward.

Again, he says:

> If it is a revolution, it is a peaceful one, achieved without violence, without the overthrow of the purposes of established law, and without the denial of just treatment to any individual or class.

Words, words, words! What an answer the little business men and the farmers all over the country could make to this last misstatement if only their protests could come to light! He talks of the common fellow, but his deeds are all for the 38 international bankers.

The voice of Jacob for the people, but the hand of Esau is on the directing lever in the interests of the international bankers and the 600 trusts.

The President's administration is not the will and expression of true Democrats. They have endured with silent bitterness seeing their hands tied and constitutional prerogatives filched from the people. No wonder the Democrats, for the first time in scores of years, failed to hold a Jefferson's birthday banquet. The incongruity of it was too glaring.

If I were disposed, I could quote all day from distinguished Democrats their repudiation of the actions of the administration.

VAST BUREAUCRACY FASTENED UPON US

A prominent Democrat, Bainbridge Colby, former Secretary of State under President Wilson, said, as quoted in the Washington Herald for Monday, May 28, 1934:

> A vast bureaucracy has been called into being and fastened upon us without our realizing it, much less authorizing it.
> Gradually it has dawned upon the country, and it is now quite plain, that recovery was only partially the aim of the administration. A great part of its interest has been in radical institutional overturn and new modeling of the state.
> The guarantees of the Constitution are dismissed lightly as if they were irrelevances in the present-day life of America. The basic principles of the Constitution, we are told, must be somehow got around.
> But if one will review the history of past crises, it will be seen how splendidly the Constitution has met each one and how faithfully our highest Court has discharged its duty as the Constitution's guardian as well as its interpreter.
> It is the most American thing about America. Darkness shall not envelop it.

Hear what another great Democrat, ex-Senator Thomas, has to say:

[Copy of a letter sent to ex-United States Senator Jonathan Bourne, Jr., by ex-Senator Thomas to Senator ELMER D. THOMAS]

DENVER, COLO., April 15, 1934.

Hon. ELMER D. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 5th instant, enclosing copy of your speech before the National Women's Democratic Club, was received in due course and should have been answered before. The subject, however, has become so disgusting to me, because of present conditions, that I have not had the heart to consider it much further. I am obliged to you, nevertheless, for your consideration of me in the premises. I may say that I am not in any way disappointed with this administration, and have felt ever since it began that our party was under the thralldom of the most determined and at the same time the most ignorant influences that have ever been dominant in national affairs so far as its financial policies are concerned. The President seems to be constitutionally opposed to the bimetallic system of money, knows nothing about it, does not want to know anything about it, and is congenitally averse to its discussion. All of his advisers, and those possessing his confidence, seem to be equally ignorant and set against it. I have had that intuitive feeling from the start. Hence, I am not disappointed with the developments of the administration. We never had and never will have a look-in. Those who have directed financial legislation and who dominate the banking interests of the country have perceived the opportunity involved in the prevailing monetary conditions, which are more than chaotic, for a change of status of which advantage could be taken to the limit and which nothing but an overwhelming political sentiment could prevent. Hence control and management of the new President has become of outstanding and overwhelming importance. The result up to date must have been more than satisfactory to the advocates and proponents of the single standard.

Mr. Roosevelt's absolute domination of the party has been obvious from the moment of his inauguration. To my mind the banking panic, coming as it did with the new administration, was the most successful and best-planned event in the financial history of all time. That it has not been suspected and charged before is not its least feature. I am convinced that every step taken by those in power was taken in advance and occurred accordingly. The abdication by Congress of its powers and prerogatives was too rapid and the emergency legislation enacted without deliberation was possibly only as a result of that catastrophe. Hence, the retirement of gold and the penalizing of its mere possession. Its demonetization, the debasement of its standard value in exchange and all the benumbing consequences were not a haphazard series of events, but the whole thing was foreplanned and made possible by a preconceived succession of events. What could not be planned was assumed, with consequences equally satisfactory. Our silver forces capitulated before they could be prevented and our so-called "leaders" in that movement hoisted the white flag, threw down all defenses, and surrendered in advance, and the administration did not hesitate to ride roughshod over all the safeguards and defenses essential to every government, and Mr. Roosevelt became, and since has been, as much a dictator as Stalin or Mussolini.

As far as I can see, the Department of Justice has also capitulated, so that Congress and the courts are equally subject to the prevailing conditions. My life is spent and I am not personally concerned with the consequences, but I did expect something at the hands of those responsible for some show of relief through the American Congress calling itself Democratic. Their abject cowardice and lack either of principle or public spirit admits of no extenuation or excuse. Their capitulation will inevitably prove to be that of the Republic. Hence, I solemnly affirm that the present President of the United States has in my judgment not only deliberately violated every principle embodied in the American Constitution indispensable to the preservation of what we were once pleased to call American liberty, but by his usurpations has struck a vital blow to the continuance of American institutions.

I have always believed that the demonetization of silver was the first step in our progress toward political extinction, and now I know it.

I am sending copies of this letter to a few of my old friends and collaborators without any restrictions upon such use as they may see fit to make of it.

Yours most earnestly and sincerely,

C. S. THOMAS.

P.S.—If Roosevelt is a Democrat, I am not and never was. He should never dare to assert political kinship with any member of the party now or heretofore having the remotest conception of the word. It is nothing but a memory of something that now stinks to heaven. He should be repudiated as something anathema. If he is not he must be accepted by posterity as everything that he is, that he is a colossal falsehood, false to mankind, and false to every tradition of the generation he commanded that he might betray.

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES S. THOMAS.

William Randolph Hearst was as surprised as anyone else when he found he had sponsored a Frankenstein monster. Father Coughlin went along as far as he could, and when the reality faced him and he had to speak, he was cut off from his radio public.

Our condition is most grave and menacing, the more so as our leaders choose to smile and jest, to give humorous replies to laugh off all criticism. By their insouciance they lend aid and comfort to communism and anarchy, and by their childish injustice and reckless stupidity and mishandling they foment rancor in the breasts of otherwise law-abiding citizens. This situation, of their own devising, has prepared a fertile field for the dragon's teeth sowed by our international enemies.

With the recognition of Soviet Russia our channels were opened to the bold and outright dissemination of communistic doctrine; what had been done stealthily is now done openly. There has been disclosed irrefutably in the Hearst papers, during the past months, the perils that beset us through the spread of communism.

Ralph Easley proved by photostatic copies of letters and documents, whose authenticity has never been denied, that Reds are working actively in our navy yards, our schools and colleges, our towns and cities, spreading their propaganda of unrest and overthrow of government. Nothing was ever done about it.

INTERNATIONAL MERCHANT MARINE DOMINATED BY BRITISH

Another series of articles proved that the Roosevelt Steamship Co., a 100-percent-owned subsidiary of the International Mercantile Marine, is delivering our merchant marine, ship by ship, to the International Mercantile Marine, which is in turn American owned but British controlled, because they have a contract with the British Government which provides that they cannot commit any act injurious to the British merchant marine or British trade. This contract prevents the International Mercantile Marine from ever operating honestly any American ship on the North Atlantic because it would be in competition with British ships, and this would clearly be an act injurious to British trade and the British merchant marine.

The International Mercantile Marine is dominated by the British Government, because the interpretation of what constitutes an injurious act is reserved by the British Government, and the person who makes the decision as to the injurious acts is the Lord High Admiral of the British Navy.

It was this contract, which is in force, that destroyed the Leviathan, and it is this contract which threatens every American ship that falls into the hands of the International Mercantile Marine. Because of the existence of this contract, the International Mercantile Marine tracked down, through the Roosevelt Steamship Co., the prize ships of the United States Government war-time fleet, and have them now in their possession. It is interesting to know that in case of war we would find our merchant marine under the control of the Lord High Admiral of the British Navy.

Two fearless college lads, Walter Donnelly and William Sardo, set forth the college situation, and the proof that it is true is, again, that nothing is being done. They are on the ground and know what they are talking about. These boys say that the schools and colleges of the Nation are being flooded with foreign communistic propaganda, often with the encouragement of the faculty. They name the organizations which are openly carrying on these activities.

I shall ask that certain excerpts from newspaper articles be printed at the conclusion of my speech.

STATE DESTROYING INDIVIDUALISM

Europe calls it the Yankee trek to Moscow. In this Soviet Russia, which is held up to us as a shining example, to whose wrong principles our addled "brain trust" is committing us with feverish haste, 5,000,000 people died of starvation winter before last. They do not dare to complain. They are shot if they do. Delegations visiting are shown just what the propagandists want them to see. It is like the progress of Prince Buddha through the flower-garnished streets of the city—all the ugliness, the suffering, the dirt carefully hidden away. If, when they come back, they say anything not nominated in the bond, they cannot ever go back. There can be no mention of the deadly weakening effect of substituting the state for the individual.

We have had depressions before, thirty some, but this is the first time we have called in the Government to save us by wrecking the Constitution. Can it be American citizens are cast in softer mold; that they will not waken and rally to their own salvation? Surely they will not sit supinely by and permit this buying of votes with the people's money; this killing of initiative and industry; this squandering of our national wealth and resources. The move to make the individual the creature of the state and the state the creature of a few officeholders has gone far. The credit of the Nation has been disrupted. Small businesses have been wiped out. Savings of the thrifty have been gobbled up.

Capital has been relentlessly punished. The public debt has been enormously increased by an Ossa upon Pelion of clumsy, expensive, high-salaried commissions and duplicate bureaucracies, which pry into and endeavor to control every human activity. Voice a complaint, and the answer is a new commission.

The danger to American institutions, the list to the left, is so great that the question is removed from the realm of partisanship. It is a call to the Nation, regardless of party. The people were deceived by the slogan, "The new deal." They had no thought of voting-in a revolution or an industrial dictatorship. The Democratic platform, which they thought they were voting-in, has been abandoned in favor of the Socialist platform.

It is time for definite action and sharp command to halt the headlong rush to chaos and Red ruin. The "brain trusters" do not want recovery. We were well on the way to recovery in August and September of 1932. They purposely intermeddled and thwarted what would have been a natural and inevitable rebound, hoping that the people in their agony and starvation, their hopeless inability to escape, would welcome anything, even this revolution, on the familiar old theory that "it cannot be worse."

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that certain excerpts from newspaper articles be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

1. The Communist Third Internationale.
2. The National Student League, a directly affiliated organization, which takes its orders from New York City, 114 West Fourteenth Street.
3. The Friends of the Soviet Union, directly affiliated, with headquarters in Washington.
4. The Young Pioneers of America, boldly communistic, of 43 East One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Street, New York City, which has a slogan entitled "Smash the Boy Scouts."
5. The Young Communist League, of New York origin.

Each of these has a publication or propaganda sheet, in which they call on American youth to prepare for coming class struggles.

Playing directly into their hands, by urging the abolition of the patriotic organizations and preparedness activities fostered by the United States Government are:

1. The World Congress of Youth Against War and Fascism, 104 Fifth Avenue, New York.
2. Intercollegiate Council on International Cooperation, 2929 Broadway, New York, which was founded at Geneva, Switzerland, and is operated by a group of graduates from some of the largest and most distinguished American universities.
3. Affiliates of the Intercollegiate Council of International Cooperation, including the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, National Student Federation of America, League of Industrial Democracy, National Student League, and a long list of others, names of all of which we have. One other, the National Council Student Christian Associations.

Practically every school or college in Washington has been subjected to the campaigns of these organizations.

Only recently at Georgetown the Hoya, a student publication, was embarrassed to find in it an advertisement by the Friends of the Soviet Union, offering a free trip to Russia this summer, for "educational" purposes, to the student selling the most subscriptions to the Friends of the Soviet Union organ.

FACULTY MYSTIFIED

How this advertisement crept into the publication is a source of great mystery to the faculty, which has started an investigation to learn how such unauthorized material crept in.

Howard University, a school maintained by the United States Government, is a hotbed of such activities. The National Student League, which is one of the most directly affiliated of the Communist branch organizations, has even gone so far as to hold a national convention at Rankin Memorial Chapel there.

At Maryland University pacifist activities have been rampant for some time, and unpreparedness advocates made a great display of the "martyred" students who were expelled for refusal to serve with the R.O.T.C.

One Tucker Smith, secretary of the committee on militarism in education, visited the president of the university and declared that he was acting in behalf of the two students who were expelled for their refusal to take part in the R.O.T.C., and made veiled threats of unfavorable newspaper publicity for the school. He said he was present at the boys' request.

GEORGETOWN INCLUDED

The National Student League claims to have an organization at Georgetown University, which has managed to escape identity by faculty or patriotic students. The National Student League and other organizations are flooding Georgetown and other schools here with questionnaires. However, at Georgetown, at least, the faculty is exerting every effort to find all such material and send it back to its sources as rapidly as possible.

We have stated the case in Washington only briefly, trying to show what are the chief organizations at work here undermining traditional American ideals and attitudes among the students. As a matter of fact, Washington schools have repelled these invaders more successfully than some others, notably those of New York.

In tomorrow's article we shall describe in detail the Communist and unpreparedness machines, which seek to organize in student groups.

Persons prominent in civic and church life, unrealizing of the paths into which they are being led, have contributed heavily to support such bodies. We shall reveal their names and the procedure they endorse also.

The N.S.L., which boasts of organizations in 129 colleges and universities in this country, sets forth as follows:

"We demand abolition of the R.O.T.C., equality of students of all races, colors, creed, and nationality, transference of State and governmental appropriations for military purposes into funds to be used for needy students' relief, right of students to petition, hold meetings, or conduct strikes on or off campus, destruction of all illusions of race supremacy as fostered by our educational system."

Then, after denying that it is a "red organization", its yearbook for 1933 says:

"The fact that the school and city officials are opposed to Communists does not mean that the student body should also. On the contrary, we have found in the course of our struggle that the Communists in our organization have the clearest understanding of student problems and their relations and often provide us with the best leaders. Not only that, but our struggles often show, notably in the City College (N.Y.) case, that the Communist Party is the only political party prepared to give the student body concrete support in its studies."

The yearbook also states that there is a Young Communist League, with which we shall deal further on in this article, which also functions in the schools and colleges. Communism, it further says, has advanced education, while followers of other political beliefs have brought curtailment of it.

PUBLISH MAGAZINE

The N.S.L. publishes a monthly propaganda magazine, Student Review, which devotes its whole space to editorializing in stories of the revolutionary and antipreparedness sentiments it has announced. The advertising space in it is usually almost wholly taken up by Soviet Government agencies, such as Torgsin, the trust which has set up a series of 5- and 10-cent stores in Russia, and solicits purchases from America.

Also, Amkniga, a publication agency, takes considerable space to offer all kinds of Communist official literature. Other advertisements offer "food at proletarian prices", and "workers' dances."

Such is the N.S.L., which, as a prime principle, would abolish patriotic preparedness training in American schools and colleges.

A more frank organization is the Young Pioneers, strictly communistic, whose publication, New Pioneers, is couched for the grade-school student's eye, with cartoon strips, puzzles, and "proletarian" games to supplement the simply worded stories. But, like the N.S.L., it champions resistance to patriotic appeals for preparedness.

The Pioneers, incidentally, are out to smash the Boy Scouts as capitalistic manifestations and children prepared for imperialist war. Also they distribute Red songbooks, in which are words and music of such hymns as the famed Red marching song, "The Internationale", "Hit, Hit, Hitler", "Come, Comunard", "Red Star", and "Our Emblem."

FIGHTS CAPITALISM

The Intercollegiate League for Industrial Democracy, too, is more frankly violent in the open than is the N.S.L. It states through its publication, Student Outlook, that it fights against war, capitalism, race prejudice, and intellectual sham.

Organizations of similar temper which were subject to call for the World Congress of Youth Against War and Fascism, to be held in Paris last summer, include the American Committee for Struggle Against War, Anti-Imperialist League, Fellowship of Reconciliation, Green International, International Workers' Order, Labor Sports Union, National Lithuanian Youth Federation, National Student Committee, Negro Student Problems, National Student League, Nature Freundel Needle Trades Workers Industrial Union, War Resisters' League, Young Pioneers, and Young Communist League.

W. Walter Ludwig, secretary of the Pioneer Youth of America, and E. C. Johnson, secretary of the committee on militarism in education, also notified the congress of their availability.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2980) to modify the effect of certain Chippewa Indian treaties on areas in Minnesota.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (S. 3170) to revise air-mail laws.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H.R. 9322) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 195. An act respecting contracts of industrial life insurance in the District of Columbia;

S. 1757. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Mount Olivet Cemetery Co. in the District of Columbia";

S. 2508. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission and the Attorney General of the United States, to make equitable adjustments of conflicting claims between the United States and other claimants of lands along the shores of the Potomac River, Anacostia River, and Rock Creek in the District of Columbia;

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have just received a telegram from Chicago which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The telegram will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., May 27, 1934.

Hon. Senator SIMEON D. FESS,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The A.A.A. compel the cotton grower to plow up his cotton. Then they destroyed 6,000,000 pigs. They make the wheat farmer plow up his wheat, cut his acreage, and paid him for so doing. Then this A.A.A. combination turn around and send relief to the districts where they cause less crops to be sown, and the taxpayers again pay both ways. Willful waste always makes woeful want; that is God's law, not Secretary Wallace. The A.A.A. sowed the wind; now they will reap the whirlwind due to one of the worst spring and summer droughts this country has ever experienced. Consistency, thou art a jewel; pay to destroy crops, then pay for relief of those destroyed. Keep up your good fight against such bureaus; it is the alphabetical soup that is ruining this great Commonwealth.

H. T. JOHNSON, 7610 Colfax Avenue.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator from Oregon agree to having the Senate committee amendments taken up at this time?

Mr. McNARY. No; Mr. President, I could not do that.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator prefers not to do so I shall not insist.

Mr. McNARY. I could not do that, because the understanding was that we were to start in on the limitation of debate tomorrow. So I could not agree to the request of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well; I shall not insist upon it. I ask at this time if the Senator will agree that when we proceed to the consideration of the bill the Senate committee amendments may be first considered.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to that, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and ask for a roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—TREATY OF RELATIONS WITH CUBA (EXECUTIVE Q)

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the President's message be read.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that the injunction of secrecy be removed as to the message and accompanying papers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The message from the President of the United States was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, I transmit herewith a treaty of relations between the United States of America and the Republic of Cuba, signed at Washington on May 29, 1934.

This treaty would supersede the treaty of relations between the United States and Cuba signed at Habana on May 22, 1903.

I have publicly declared "that the definite policy of the United States from now on is one opposed to armed intervention." In this new treaty with Cuba the contractual right to intervene in Cuba which had been granted to the United States in the earlier treaty of 1903 is abolished and those further rights, likewise granted to the United States in the same instrument, involving participation in the determination of such domestic policies of the Republic of Cuba as those relating to finance and to sanitation, are omitted therefrom. By the consummation of this treaty this Government will make it clear that it not only opposes the policy of armed intervention but that it renounces those rights of intervention and interference in Cuba which have been bestowed upon it by treaty.

Our relations with Cuba have been and must always be especially close. They are based not only upon geographical proximity but likewise upon the fact that American blood was shed as well as Cuban blood to gain the liberty of the Cuban people and to establish the Republic of Cuba as an independent power in the family of nations. I believe that this treaty will further maintain those good relations upon the enduring foundation of sovereign equality and friendship between our two people, and I consequently recommend to the Senate its ratification.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Accompaniments:
Treaty as above;
Report of the Secretary of State.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 29, 1934.

The accompanying treaty was made public, as follows:

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty of relations between the United States of America and the Republic of Cuba, which was signed at Washington on May 29, 1934.

This treaty would supersede the treaty of relations with Cuba signed at Habana on May 22, 1903.

Article II of the treaty reiterates the provisions of article IV of the treaty of 1903, which provides that all the acts effected in Cuba by the United States during its military occupation of the island up to May 20, 1902, the date upon which the Republic of Cuba was established, have been ratified and held as valid, and that all the rights legally acquired by virtue of these acts shall be maintained and protected.

Under article III the United States retains its present rights with regard to its lease of the lands occupied at Guantanamo for a naval station, and it is provided that these rights shall continue so long as the United States does not abandon the said naval station and so long as the two Governments do not agree to any modifications thereof.

Article IV permits either of the two contracting parties to exercise, at its discretion, without its act being considered unfriendly, the right to suspend communications between those of its ports that it may designate and all or part of the territory of the other party, whenever in its own judgment a situation should arise which appears to presage an outbreak of contagious disease in the territory of the other contracting party.

Respectfully submitted.

CORDELL HULL.

Accompaniment: Treaty as above.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 29, 1934.

The United States of America and the Republic of Cuba, being animated by the desire to fortify the relations of friendship between the two countries and to modify, with this purpose, the relations established between them by the Treaty of Relations signed at Habana, May 22, 1903, have appointed, with this intention, as their Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America; Mr. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State of the United States of America, and Mr. Sumner Welles, Assistant Secretary of State of the United States of America; and

The Provisional President of the Republic of Cuba, Señor Dr. Manuel Márquez Sterling, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Cuba to the United States of America;

Who, after having communicated to each other their full powers which were found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I

The Treaty of Relations which was concluded between the two contracting parties on May 22, 1903, shall cease to be in force, and is abrogated, from the date on which the present Treaty goes into effect.

ARTICLE II

All the acts effected in Cuba by the United States of America during its military occupation of the island, up to May 20, 1902, the date on which the Republic of Cuba was established, have been ratified and held as valid; and all the rights legally acquired by virtue of those acts shall be maintained and protected.

ARTICLE III

Until the two contracting parties agree to the modification or abrogation of the stipulations of the agreement in regard to the lease to the United States of America of lands in Cuba for coaling and naval stations signed by the President of the Republic of Cuba on February 16, 1903, and by the President of the United States of America on the 23d day of the same month and year, the stipulations of that agreement with regard to the naval station of Guantánamo shall continue in effect. The supplementary agreement in regard to naval or coaling stations signed between the two Governments on July 2, 1903, also shall continue in effect in the same form and on the same conditions with respect to the naval station at Guantánamo. So long as the United States of America shall not abandon the said naval station of Guantánamo or the two Governments shall not agree to a modification of its present limits, the station shall continue to have the territorial area that it now has, with the limits that it has on the date of the signature of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE IV

If at any time in the future a situation should arise that appears to point to an outbreak of contagious disease in the territory of either of the contracting parties, either of the two Governments shall, for its own protection, and without its act being considered unfriendly, exercise freely and at its discretion the right to suspend communications between those of its ports that it may designate and all or part of the territory of the other party, and for the period that it may consider to be advisable.

ARTICLE V

The present Treaty shall be ratified by the contracting parties in accordance with their respective constitutional methods; and shall go into effect on the date of the exchange of their ratifications, which shall take place in the city of Washington as soon as possible.

IN FAITH WHEREOF, the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty and have affixed their seals hereto.

DONE in duplicate, in the English and Spanish languages, at Washington on the twenty-ninth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-four.

TRANSFER OF ADMINISTRATION OF GOVERNMENT OF PUERTO RICO TO THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 16 of the act of March 3, 1933 (ch. 212, 47 Stat. 1517), as amended by title III of the act of March 20, 1933 (ch. 3, 48 Stat. 16), I am transmitting herewith an Executive order establishing the Division of Territories and Island Possessions in the Department of the Interior and transferring thereto the functions of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, War Department, pertaining to the administration of the government of Puerto Rico.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 29, 1934.

THE AIR MAIL—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the conference report on S. 3170 relating to air-mail contracts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report on Senate bill 3170.

[For conference report see RECORD of Senate proceedings, May 23, p. 9313.]

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee will look at page 2 of the conference report, subsection (d), third line, I am advised that the language "eastern and western coastal routes" does not appear in either the House bill or the Senate bill. How does it happen to be in the report?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is perfectly simple. The House struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill when the Senate bill went to the House, and thereupon passed a bill of its own. That put the whole matter in conference, and this was an amendment to the Senate bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to be fair about this matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. COPELAND. As I understand the Senator, the matter in italics in the report is the language of the bill as it passed the House. I do not understand that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is my understanding that neither in the original Senate bill nor in the House bill was there any reference whatever to any north or south primary route.

Mr. COPELAND. That is what I understand.

Mr. McKELLAR. There was not; but the House struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill, which set up an entirely new bill, and thereupon an amendment to the Senate text was made; and under the rules, as I understand, that is perfectly permissible.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I know that that is exactly as the Senator understands it, but I do not so understand it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator deny that the House struck out the entire Senate bill after the enacting clause and inserted a bill of its own? That is what happened.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In the House bill which was substituted there was no reference to any such primary route, was there?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course there was not; but there is no reason in the world why an amendment to the Senate text could not be agreed upon in conference. I see the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], on the floor. He is conversant with the House rules.

In other words, the air mail bill was passed by the Senate and went to the House, and the House struck out all after the enacting clause and substituted its bill for the Senate bill. In conference, an amendment to the Senate text was offered and agreed to, and is a part of the conference report, adding two routes to the primary routes; and, of course, in my judgment, it was entirely in order.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, it seems to me perfectly clear that where one body strikes out all after the enacting clause of a bill passed by the other body the whole subject is then in conference, and any amendment germane to either bill may be made.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is my understanding of the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think that is entirely correct, although some question has been raised about it here from time to time.

Mr. CLARK. I do not profess to speak for the Senate practice, but I know what the practice has been in the House of Representatives.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. My understanding is—and if I am in error I shall be glad to be corrected—that the House struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill, and inserted a provision providing for the appointment of a commission to study the question and to make a report. There was no definite legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no, Mr. President; the Senator is entirely mistaken. The commission of which the Senator speaks was provided for in both bills, and there was practically no difference between the two.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I feel quite confident that the Senator from Tennessee, usually so accurate, is mistaken.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope I am not.

Mr. COPELAND. I hope so, too.

Mr. McKELLAR. I cannot say positively. I have been mistaken a great many times in my life.

Mr. COPELAND. Not many times, I regret to say, because the Senator has been in opposition to me at times when I was sorry that he was not wrong; but, Mr. President, I feel that we could not hurriedly agree to this report if I am right in my understanding that this language is not to be found either in the Senate bill or in the House bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure the Senator is correct about that. This particular language is an amendment to the Senate text.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask, then, that the report go over until we can find out about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to have it go over. I think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] wanted it to go over, also.

Mr. FESS. I have not seen the report.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to have it go over until tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will go over until tomorrow.

ADDITIONAL JUSTICE OF THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] has a matter that he wishes to bring before the Senate in the form of a motion to reconsider a bill that was passed yesterday while the calendar was under call.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a motion to reconsider which is to be found on page 38 of the calendar. It is to reconsider the vote by which was passed Senate bill 1777, providing for an additional justice of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, Mr. President, I move that the votes by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and passed, be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. AUSTIN. I now ask that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

SYMPOSIUM ON THE MEANING OF MONEY

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a symposium on the meaning of money, written by world authorities, compiled and reviewed by the Consumers' Guild of America.

This valuable document is presented to the Congress of the United States by the Consumers' Guild, and in it will be found the answers to questions which are troublesome to us. I suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, with the thanks of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE LATE BRAND WHITLOCK

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a great number of editorials have been printed in honor of the late Brand Whitlock, ex-Ambassador to Belgium. One of the finest appeared in the Washington Evening Star. I ask the Senate to listen to the reading of this editorial, as it is one of the most beautiful I have seen in print.

I send the editorial to the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the editorial will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

BRAND WHITLOCK

It is difficult to part with Brand Whitlock. He was one of the men who are good to know. His gifts of personal charm and courtesy transcended his talents in literature and were the foundation of his success in diplomacy. Gentle manners were the natural expression of his knightly and generous spirit, and they endeared him to all with whom he came into contact—humble people loved him and great people were frankly proud of his acquaintance.

When Americans think of Belgium in the maelstrom of the World War they will remember his name with those of Albert and Mercier. The King, the cardinal, and he constituted a trio whose function, providentially, it was to reassert humane ideals in the face of a heathen doctrine of selfish expediency. The white light of fame beat upon them the while they challenged rampant Nietzschianism, and their celebrity was promoted rather than impaired by the moderation of their methods, the chivalrous modesty of their conduct of themselves through the ordeal. They did their duty with a grace and wore their laurels unpresumingly. And now, 20 years after the debacle, they are reunited in the rest which men who have bravely toiled for peace are believed to merit as a fit reward.

The development of Mr. Whitlock's career differed but slightly from that of many another eminent American. He came of what may be described as average stock and received the ordinary type of education. His most effective and useful training he acquired in journalism. When he was appointed to represent the United States at Brussels he had an honorable reputation as a reform politician—he had been mayor of Toledo for four terms and had been active in the liberal wing of the Democratic Party in Ohio. President Wilson named him to Belgium because it was understood that he would appreciate a quiet post which would afford him leisure for writing. Fate laughed at the notion of such a sinecure and dealt him, instead, the cards of conflict and turmoil. But he was equal to his destiny, rose uncomplainingly to meet its demands, and emerged from the cataclsym a world figure—not made by the war, but simply disclosed by it.

His place in the chronicle of the age is secure. When future generations read the annals of Armageddon they will salute his memory with respect and gratitude—if only for the dramatic story of that one feverish night when he appealed in vain to Prussian officialdom in behalf of Edith Cavell.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting nominations of sundry postmasters, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Augustine V. Long to be United States judge for the northern district of Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Leo. J. Hickey to be United States attorney for the eastern district of New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for promotions in the Navy.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, on the calendar for appointment as ensigns in the Navy are the names of the midshipmen in the Naval Academy at Annapolis who are expected to receive their diplomas tomorrow or the next day. I ask unanimous consent that these nominations be confirmed en bloc, and that the President be notified.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, does the list include the nomination of the young man who has been getting his education from the Government for 4 years and resigned before his graduation, the resignation to take effect immediately after graduation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I know nothing about the case to which the Senator from Missouri refers.

Mr. CLARK. I have not had an opportunity to examine the list.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand the list does not include that name.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to object, except that I should like to enter an observation against that as a very bad practice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Navy are confirmed en bloc, and the President will be immediately notified.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk read sundry nominations for promotions in the Marine Corps.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I make the same request as to the nominations in the Marine Corps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Marine Corps nominations are confirmed en bloc, and the President will be immediately notified.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until tomorrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p.m.) took a recess until tomorrow, May 30, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MAY 29, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Merciful God, our Heavenly Father, may our faith in Thee be strong and may our hopes lead us to brighter and happier days. Make them vivid, distinct, and free from obscurity and uncertainty. Let them be illuminating, expanding our lives and giving a new meaning to our activities. Be gracious to assure us that all things work together for good for those who put their trust in Thee, who are right in purpose and are unselfish in the things they seek. Heavenly Father, bless the homes of the officers and the Members of the Congress. We entreat Thee to hold us all in Thy hands, in which we may rest without fear. In the dispensation of Thy providence, prepare us for whatever awaits us, and praise and glory be unto Thee forever. In our Savior's name. Amen.

FOREIGN-TRADE ZONES

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday the previous question was ordered on the passage of the bill which was then under consideration, H.R. 9322, to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

This bill was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], who was absent yesterday on account of illness and, therefore, was not able to come here and participate in the discussion and consideration of the bill. I ask unanimous consent that before the roll call is had he may be permitted to proceed for 2 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is making a rather unusual request.

Mr. BYRNS. I know it is an unusual request, but these are unusual circumstances.

Mr. SNELL. I am not going to object, but the statement was made the gentleman could not be here. The request is an unreasonable one, and the gentleman knows it is.

Mr. BLANTON. This is in behalf of a good New Yorker.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] is the author of the bill and was prevented from being here on account of illness. I think we ought to give him the opportunity to make a few remarks.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is establishing a very poor precedent, but go ahead.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I remind the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] that before we adjourned yesterday he asked and received unanimous consent of the House that the gentleman from New York may extend his remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

Mr. BYRNS. I did not make that request.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The request was made by someone on that side of the House.

Mr. SNELL. It was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULLEN].

Mr. WOODRUFF. I have an idea that the gentleman from New York may under that leave to extend his remarks set forth fully his views on this bill. In view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that I have never yet objected to a unanimous-consent request of any Member of this House to address the House, I shall not establish the precedent now.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask if this will interfere with the 30 minutes that I was allowed to address the House?

The SPEAKER. It will delay the gentleman 2 minutes. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

CELLER FREE PORT BILL

Mr. CELLER. I shall not take long, and rise primarily to express my gratitude to the members of the subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee, presided over by my esteemed friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULLEN], and the other members of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], the gentleman from California [Mr. EVANS], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER]. I am also indebted to my esteemed friend and colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, of the Rules Committee, who helped us get the rule. I am very gratified that after 20 years of struggle, we have been able to get this bill out of committee and well on its way to final passage. [Applause.]

This bill has the support of this administration. President Roosevelt, at a press conference, indicated his approval. Hon. Cordell Hull, our Secretary of State, in part writes as follows:

In the opinion of the Department, the establishment of foreign-trade zones under proper regulations is calculated to further the foreign commerce of the United States, and the Department views such legislation with favor.

Hon. Daniel P. Roper, Secretary of Commerce, writes in part as follows:

The Department of Commerce has at various times in the past expressed itself to the detailed provisions of any particular bill. The establishment of such foreign-trade ones is for the purpose of facilitating reexport and transshipment trade * * *. The proposal does not introduce anything essentially new into our law. In fact, this is little more than the minimizing of the official limitations and costs involved in the formalities of entry into bonded warehouse and drawback now provided in the American tariff law * * *. However, it appears that the legislation is desirable in principle as a grant of authority to be utilized should the occasion warrant.

Hon. George H. Dern, Secretary of War, writes in part as follows:

Insofar as the interests committed to this Department are concerned, I am not aware of any objection to the enactment of the bill.

Hon. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Secretary of the Treasury, in part writes as follows:

I believe that, under normal conditions in world trade, foreign-trade zones, such as provided for in the bill, might aid materially in fostering a growth of the transshipment and reexport trade of ports advantageously situated to handle such trade. In principle, therefore, I believe the bill is meritorious, and I see no objection to its enactment.

In addition, the bill has the approval of the United States Tariff Commission, the United States Shipping Board, and Hon. George Peek, head of the United States Import-Export Bank.

Let me invite your careful attention to the opinion expressed by President Herbert Hoover when he was Secretary of Commerce, in a letter written on December 19, 1925, after the Tariff Act of 1922 had been in operation more than 3 years.

The letter is addressed to the late lamented Senator Jones, of the State of Washington. The letter says:

Complying with your request of the 12th instant for a report from this Department on Senate bill no. 66, entitled "To provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes", it is my opinion that properly located foreign-trade zones would facilitate and encourage the export trade of the United States and be of material benefit to our merchant marine, for the following reasons:

It will promote and expedite our transshipment trade by eliminating the customs formalities and difficulties under our present system of warehousing for reexport.

In the course of the tariff revision of September 1922 customs administrative regulations were so liberalized that many of the activities relating to foreign merchandise under section 3 of the bill are now allowed in bonded warehouses without requiring the payment of duties; however, they are so encumbered with requirements, such as filing manifests, making formal entry of all foreign merchandise whether intended for ultimate entry into this country or not, having goods weighed or otherwise examined before they are allowed to be deposited in bonded warehouses, that the privileges available are not sufficiently attractive to be used to any great extent.

That applies to the provisions of the act of 1930, which did liberalize them to some extent, but they still have the same red tape to go through in the case of reshipment, with the same conditions referred to by President Hoover, who was then the head of the Department of Commerce. His letter to the late Senator Jones goes on to say:

It would place this country in a better position to take advantage of our large consumption of many foreign raw materials and distribute such among foreign countries.

It would improve the opportunity for obtaining full cargoes for American ships both ways and result in a more economical use of our merchant marine by eliminating delays due to customs formalities.

In my opinion, the bill is designed to accomplish the foregoing, and I therefore indorse it and recommend its passage.

The bill has the approval of the following trade associations: Chamber of Commerce of the United States, Port of New York Authority, Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, the Merchants Association of the City of New York, the Maritime Association, Boston Chamber of Commerce, Boston Port Authority, Maritime Association of Boston, Retail Trade Board of Boston, the State Port Authority of Virginia, Miami Beach Chamber of Commerce, Miami Beach City Commission, the Port of Philadelphia Ocean Traffic Bureau, the Philadelphia Board of Trade, the Baltimore Association of Commerce, the Export and Import Bureau of Baltimore, the New Orleans Association of Commerce, the New Orleans Cotton Exchange, the Chicago Association of Commerce, the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, the Pacific American Steamship Association, Ship Owners Association of the Pacific Coast, the Trade Association of Hampton Roads and Norfolk, the Chamber of Commerce of Jersey City, the Port of Newark, N.J., the Shippers Conference of Greater New York, and the American Association of Port Authorities.

DEFINITION OF A FREE PORT

The question has been asked by many Members, What is a free port? The best definition I know is the one given by the Federal Trade Commission some time ago, after it made an exhaustive study of foreign-trade ones and free ports. This definition is as follows:

The word "free" in connection with "port" or "zone" is apt to be misleading. It is proper to note, therefore, that the term has no relation either to port charges or to any policy of free trade or protection in this case. Conventional nomenclature is in this case misleading. "A neutral zone" would be more properly descriptive. A free port or free zone is a place limited in extent but differs from adjacent territory in being exempt from customs laws as affecting goods destined for reexport. It means simply that, as regards duties, there is freedom unless and until imported foods enter the domestic market. A free zone may be defined as an isolated, inclosed, and policed area in or adjacent to a port of entry, without resident population, furnished with the necessary facilities for lading and unlading, for supplying fuel and ship stores, for storing goods, and for reshipping them by land and water—an area within which goods may be landed, stored, mixed, blended, repacked, manufactured, and reshipped without payment of duties and without the intervention of customs officials. It is subject a little within adjacent regions to all the laws relating to public health, vessel inspection, postal service, labor conditions, immigration, and indeed everything except the customs. The purpose of the free zone is to encourage and expedite that part of a nation's foreign trade which its government wishes to free from the restrictions instituted by custom duties. In other words, it aims to foster the dealing in foreign goods that are imported, not for domestic consumption but for reexport to foreign markets and for the conditioning or for combining with domestic products previous to export.

For the longest time our Government has sought to do the very things that a free port aims at; namely, to encourage transshipments of goods out of the country that have been imported, to encourage the repacking, blending, mixing, manipulating, and reshipment of foreign goods upon which there is now allowed the drawback. It sought to do this by setting up, first, bonded warehouses; second, bonded manufacturing warehouses; and third, by the drawback.

But the Government, jealous of its revenues, has hedged about these drawbacks (which were designed to bring about facility of reexports and transshipments) to such an extent that business finds itself utterly handicapped and frustrated.

A Government bonded warehouse is a place where goods bonded for reexport may be entered and held free of duty. A bonded manufacturing warehouse is a place where, without payment of duties, the imported goods may be handled, altered, sorted, blended, and manipulated, as well as manufactured, either with or without the admixture of domestic materials and parts. The drawback is the payment of 99 percent of the duty paid on imported goods after they have been reexported.

You might ask, after the Government has set up these facilities for drawback, for warehousing, and for manufacturing and warehousing, why is it necessary to pass the free port bill? The answer lies in the restrictions and handicaps inherent in the drawback, the bonded warehouse and the bonded manufacturing warehouse. Let me point out a few of the inadequacies, inconsistencies, and difficulties in these bonding and drawback provisions of our tariff legislation.

First, if a man, for example, wishes to store some imported goods he must give a bond in an amount double of the duty, and that bond is forfeited if the goods are stolen or lost or destroyed or removed. Secondly, even the drayage and the carting of the goods between the dock and the warehouse, probably over a comparatively short distance, must be under bond. Thirdly, there must be constant customs control and supervision.

The Government is so jealous of its revenues, and rightly so, that it sort of holds a policeman's club over the merchants' and manufacturers' heads at all times. The dealer is confronted constantly with a uniform. That surely does not make for peace of mind and business comfort. While, for example, the goods are in the bonded warehouse, they must be placed and arranged in accordance with well-defined regulations, so that at any time they may be checked and inspected by special agents of the Treasury Department. Under the free port bill no such minute regulations as to the placing and arrangement of goods would be necessary. Under a free port, there would be the absence of strict surveillance within the zone. The surveillance would be transferred to the boundaries of the zone.

Under the free port bill there would not be the necessity for the strictest kind of accounts of all warehousing transactions. Under the present regime, the warehouse must be closed and locked by a Government lock, except during usual business hours. Special permission must be obtained, overtime charges must be paid, a customs agent must be present to enter the warehouse after hours. No matter how great the emergency, the merchant or dealer cannot enter the warehouse, save under these conditions and restrictions. All this red tape would be avoided under my bill. There would be no necessity for these minute regulations. There would be no danger of loss of revenue because there would be no necessity for payment of revenue or tariff unless and until the goods leave the stockaded area and enter customs territory.

Permit me to direct attention to some of the irksome provisions concerning bonded manufacturing warehousing, from a report of the Tariff Commission.

The mere statement of the regulations sufficiently indicates the limited usefulness, so far as export trade is concerned, of the bonded storage warehouse. Even more stringent are those applying to the bonded manufacturing warehouse. In the later institution foreign materials may be entered free of duty and worked up into manufactures ready for consumption.

(a) Production can be carried on in such a warehouse for export only. With a few special exceptions, the output cannot be disposed of in the domestic market, even on payment of duty. The most important exceptions are metal from ore smelted in bond, and cigars "made in whole from tobacco imported from one country." Minor exceptions are found in a provision for the entry of Mexican peas, or garbanzo, which have been cleaned at such warehouses, and in the permission to sell for domestic consumption byproducts and waste arising in the manufacture of goods for export, provided duty is first paid on such articles as if imported from abroad.

(a) To protect the public revenue from unauthorized entry of goods into domestic trade, the owner of the goods is required, under present procedure, to give bond in double the amount of the duty, which is forfeited if the goods are stolen, lost, destroyed, or fraudulently removed.

(b) Even drayage between dock and warehouse must be done under bond.

(c) In addition, from the time they enter port until they are reshipped the goods are under constant customs control and supervision.

(d) While in the warehouse they must be placed and arranged in accordance with certain well-defined regulations, so that they may at any time be checked and inspected by special agents of the Treasury Department.

(e) Permits must be obtained for their reception and delivery, and strict accounts must be kept of all warehouse transactions.

(f) Except during the usual business hours in the warehouse there is no freedom; one is constantly met with a uniform and a cop's stick always held over him.

Let us turn to the drawback provision. Importers complain bitterly about the procedure that must be followed. The drawback is the 99-percent return of the duty paid the Government upon the reexportation of the goods that had been imported. Ordinarily, the duty is paid, the goods are taken into customs territory, possibly to the importer's place of business. Then the goods are reexported, either with or without admixture of domestic goods. The reexporter then makes application for the drawback. But here again the Government imposes so many restrictions and such irksome regulations, that the importer often grows disgusted and abandons his claim. Take the situation, for example, that confronted a very large concern in Brooklyn, from whence I come. The concern is Hills Bros. Mr.

Lucius R. Hillman, of this firm, importers of citrons, dates, and fruits, testified as follows:

We import dry fruits, dromedary dates, and currants from Greece, citron from the Mediterranean. We repack and standardize these goods, and export to Mexico and other countries. This business brought us in contact with the drawback system. I have come to the conclusion that the manufacturing end would be largely an assembling of food products. With the use of sugar and the drawback on sugar, the difficulty which we experienced there has made the drawback claims, in our own case, so complicated and there are so many points which are objectionable, that we dropped making such claims.

The following list shows how the applications for drawbacks are declining, clearly far more proportionately than the general decline of commerce, indicating surely that there is something wrong with the system.

Amount of customs drawbacks paid by United States since 1922

1922	$35,290,000.00
1923	11,934,000.00
1924	14,095,000.00
1925	20,658,000.00
1926	13,136,000.00
1927	13,560,046.08
1928	13,194,682.45
1929	14,925,888.43
1930	12,577,970.51
1931	12,162,475.46
1932	8,418,434.14
1933	7,154,527.56

At the hearings there was given a mass of testimony from most responsible sources, concerning the annoying and piddling regulations of the Government concerning drawback, bonding, and bonded warehouses. Here is a typical example of the testimony of such red tape.

There are a great many provisions in connections with these arrangements which are decidedly difficult and expensive to comply with. I have in my hand the announcement of the Treasury Department of rules governing "storage-manipulation warehouses" which are one of the type of warehouses providing for the handling of this transshipment business. Without going into detail, I want to call your attention to the fact that this notice indicates that there is a considerable routine which must be gone through not only by the owner of the warehouse in question in having his premises inspected, in filing his bond, in having a storekeeper in constant attendance while the warehouse is open, which entails considerable expense, but there is a further provision that when two or more manipulations are carried on simultaneously such additional storekeepers will be detailed as the collector of customs deems necessary. And then if someone comes in to have his goods manipulated—say they are furs—the provisions are that if on that manipulating floor one man has his furs out and with a Government storekeeper watching over their operations, and another man wants to withdraw some of his products from manipulation—that cannot be done at the same time if there is any conceivable possibility that there will be any mix-up.

Now, as this thing shapes up, I think—I may be wrong, but I think the United States actually discourages commerce. First, it sets up this tariff wall, then the customs book, a very formidable affair of regulations, covering some 700 pages, which require a customhouse broker to interpret, then about 8 classes of bonded warehouses, and storage, cartage, and lighterage, in customs, and a hundred forms you get from the United States Shipping Board to fill out. The exporter must export in the original marks of importation.

GENERAL SCOPE OF THE BILL

H.R. 9322 authorizes a board consisting of the Secretaries of Commerce, Treasury, and War, that under such rules and regulations as they may provide, to grant to certain corporations the privilege of establishing and maintaining these free ports in or adjacent to ports of entry under the jurisdiction of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury shall assign to the zones the necessary customs guards and officers to protect the revenue of the United States. The zone may be operated by either a public corporation or a private corporation. If a private corporation, it must be chartered under a special act of the legislature of the State. Each port of entry shall be entitled to at least one zone. In the event of repeated violations, the grant to the public or private corporation may be revoked. The grantee must provide adequate docks, warehouses, and adequate transportation connections with surrounding territory.

DECLINE OF OUR REEXPORT TRADE

The following table shows a steady decline in our reexport trade:

1920	$147,535,486
1921	106,103,332
1922	66,686,628
1923	76,777,989
1924	93,334,536
1925	91,125,076
1926	96,939,347
1927	106,511,655
1928	98,257,740
1929	83,912,175
1930	62,008,991

Here, again, there is indicated that there is something wrong with our system. I firmly believe that a foreign trade zone would greatly encourage this reexport business.

A free port has nothing to do with free trade.

The best statement that I have found on that is by Hon. William C. Redfield, formerly Secretary of Commerce.

He says, on page 20 of this United States Chamber of Commerce document [reading]:

There seems to be a lingering impression in the minds of some persons that a foreign trade zone has something to do with free trade. I wish, therefore, to repeat that a free zone or a foreign trade zone is a normal complement of a so-called "protective" policy. There is no occasion for a foreign trade zone in a free-trade country. A tariff status quo of the United States is maintainable in principle and in fact by the provisions of this bill.

Germany, a highly protective country, has several free ports. Japan and Italy also are protective countries, and have free ports. England, on the other hand, formerly practically a free-trade country, did not need foreign-trade zones, because all England was a sort of foreign-trade zone. Goods could come to English ports and could there be handled, sorted, manipulated, and transshipped to other countries without the embarrassments of customs. It is not the purpose of my bill to make this country a free-trade country in any event.

The foreign-trade zone has not that effect. Whether we have a high tariff or a low tariff, free ports can and should be established. In other words, the tariff policy of a country has nothing to do whatsoever with free ports.

THE EFFECT ON TRADE WITH WEST INDIES AND LATIN AMERICA

Permit me to quote the testimony of Hon. Frank Katzentine, mayor of Miama Beach, Fla.:

Mr. KATZENTINE. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the proponents of free-trade zones, or foreign-trade zones, or free ports, or whatever you might call it, are here from New York and much more important locations than we are, and I am very happy to concede this position to any of those gentlemen that want to speak.

The only fresh view that we can give on the problem of free ports which might be of interest to this committee, of course, lying close to the Latin-American countries like we do, having a position that we think is strategic for the attraction of Pan American or Latin American trade, we are disturbed in our area by the fact that legislation in many of those Latin American countries is now pending, or about to be brought up, for the establishment of free ports. Now I am familiar, personally, in a degree, with the situation in Cuba. Being so close, within 2 hours from Cuba by plane from Miami Beach, we intervisit a great deal from the two countries, and you would be interested to know that the new regime that has replaced Machado in the Government of Cuba are fighting seriously at this moment to establish Habana as a free transshipping point. Now, that disturbs us. We are making a bid in Miami and Miami Beach to garner all of the island trades that we can. There are many islands in the West Indies, and along the western coast of South America many republics, many independent governments, who do not warrant being made a port of call by ocean liners; and if transshipment features without the intervention of customs could be established in a southern port, and located—if it were possible for us to have the advantages of a free zone where these goods could be brought in and taken out by the small vessels who call at these islands regularly, it would certainly economically be a big feature for us.

TRANSSHIPMENTS

Foreign trade in New York dropped 75 percent in value and 50 percent in volume since 1929. This drop is typical of ports throughout the country. We must do something to fill this void. Encouragement of transshipments will help. Establishment of foreign trade zones will induce greater transshipments between two foreign countries by way of ports of the United States.

Our ports are strategically located to handle transit business between South and Central America, West Indies, and Canada on the one hand, and Europe, Asia, and Africa on the other hand.

One of the difficulties in capturing transit or reexport business is the complexity and cost of the customs regulations now necessary in connection with movement through or storage or manipulation in United States ports. Detailed supervision by Government storekeepers, filing of bonds, making out of endless forms, tickets, and receipts are necessary under the present system, but would be eliminated inside of a foreign trade zone, all policing being limited to the outside barrier in order to see that none of this business leaked into the domestic market without paying duty.

Suppose you are importing laces and embroideries, and fancy goods from Europe, and you want to distribute them in South America, and let us assume that the South American trade is of such a nature that you have got to have a peculiar shape of package, that you can throw over the pack of a mule, or even a llama, an evenly balanced package. You would be surprised to know how much the success of South American trade depends upon such a small thing as the size and shape of the package.

Now, suppose this embroidery and these fancy goods when they come from Europe are in square boxes, which are unsuitable for the South American trade. You cannot put one of them on the back of a mule. The customs regulation will not let you touch that box, or reopen it or repack it or change the shape of the package, without going through so much red tape that it just makes it unprofitable to conduct the operation at all.

Now, under this free-zone proposition, you can bring in all of those goods to this free zone, take them out of their packages, put them into the kind of package you want, and send it down to South America.

Our colleague, Representative J. MARK WILCOX, made a very interesting statement concerning transshipments through Miami. His statement could be duplicated concerning trade in almost every other port of entry along our great sea coast.

The beauty of that plan, as I see it from our own standpoint in southeast Florida, is that the various small Republics—Haiti, Cuba, and the various island republics in the West Indies, and those in northern and western South America, and the Central American countries—will have a point at which they may meet and exchange, somewhat on the idea of the old farmers' exchanges that we have in some of the rural sections of the country.

Now, in Haiti and Cuba and the Bahama group, and the various other small republics in the West Indies, and northern South America, it seems to us, if they had some point at which they might meet and exchange their goods, that it would be to the mutual advantage not only of those republics but of our country as well.

We think that we are particularly favored in our location, with reference to this particular group of nations. We think that great good can come to this country as the result of this, because there will be a point at which the buyer and the seller can meet. They can exhibit their goods, they can inspect their goods, and it will result in mutual advantage to both parties.

Now, it so happens that a great many times these small island republics, particularly down in the Bahama group, there is no individual island that is big enough to import a full cargo of any particular product, but if we had, at Miami, or at Miami Beach, a free port, at which our products might be exhibited, and they might bring their products there for exchange and exhibition, they could probably make up a cargo of various classes of goods and products of this country for importation into their own country; so it seems to me that enormous good can result to our foreign trade, particularly through our port, to South and Central America.

I herewith insert a table concerning transshipments by principal countries, which trade would be greatly benefited by foreign-trade zones.

TRANSSHIPMENTS OF ENGLAND

England is way ahead of us in the matter of transshipments. Half of the goods bought by the United States from England are not produced there at all. Cotton from Egypt we buy in London. Tin from Bolivia we buy in London. Wool from Australia and hemp from the Philippines we buy in London. We buy East Indian spirits in English ports. This should all be reversed. Encouragement of transshipments would reverse this process.

PORTS OF ENTRY

Where volume of business justifies it, ports of entry may be established inland. This is provided for under section 552 of the Tariff Act of 1930. There are seaports of entry, border ports of entry, and inland ports of entry. By virtue of thirty-eighth volume, United States Statutes at Large, page 633, a port may be established by Executive order. I herewith submit from the Customs Bureau a list of customs districts, headquarters, and ports of entry. The inland customs ports of entry are marked with an (x).

SOME OF THE OPERATIONS POSSIBLE IN A FREE PORT

First. Merchandise may be repacked in different containers. If now done, same must be under bond or duty must be repaid and drawback applied for.

Second. Division of goods for preparation of commercial grades.

Third. Mixture of goods with this same object.

Fourth. The hulling and toasting of coffee and cocoa.

Fifth. The working of hides and skins.

Sixth. Grinding of wood.

Seventh. Washing of wool.

Eighth. Extraction of oil from copra, and other oilseeds.

Ninth. The possible solidification of same.

Tenth. All operations involving manipulation of goods.

Eleventh. The exhibition of samples.

I can greatly multiply these examples. Take, for example, rice milling. This is an industry that can be successfully prosecuted in this country, provided we have sufficient supply of raw material. It is now almost limited entirely to the preparation of the domestic products for domestic consumption. It does not involve full employment. There is required expensive machinery and much skilled labor. The largest mills are idle much of the time because the domestic crop can keep them in operation only for half a year. Efforts have been made to use the idle mills in cleaning and milling oriental rice, the supply of which is very large, for reexport to the West Indies and Spanish America. To do this work profitably, the rice must be imported in full shipped cargoes and handled in bulk through grain elevators. These cargoes usually contain about 6,000 tons. The average duty is one-half cent a pound on the rice. The duty, therefore, on a full cargo, is $60,000. This is a considerable amount of capital to pay out. Under the present regime, it can only be returned by way of drawbacks—a difficult and expensive operation taking months to get the money back. This outlay of capital is a serious handicap to this successful reexport business. However, if we had a free zone or a free port we could easily bring in this rice from China and Japan to New Orleans or Galveston, clean it and process it and then ship it to Cuba or South America in the finished form without payment of one cent of import duties, and there would result a great stimulation of United States trade, giving employment to many more skilled laborers.

CONSIGNMENTS

There would be permitted in the free port the exhibiting of samples. This is now permitted in the Rockefeller Center in New York, where fine articles may be exhibited without the payment of duty. We would extend greatly the principle of exhibiting and consignment of goods by the establishment of a free port.

For example, the United States Chamber of Commerce comments favorably, particularly on that advantage that will result from a foreign-trade zone, in the following language. I will just read it briefly from one of their reports. They say that, alongside of transshipment trade, their chief argument for the free zone is its importance in the building up of a broad consignment market, that is, a consignment market for import as well as reexport. In the free ports of European countries, having protective-tariff systems, and in the ports of free trade of England, extensive consignment markets have grown up. Many grades of many commodities, raw materials, and semimanufactured materials for use in manufacturing, as well as finished products, are shipped to the great ports in quantities large enough to make for economical ocean shipment. There the manufacturers and merchants of the country, buyers from foreign countries, go and buy for immediate delivery, in the quantities desired by each individual purchaser, grades of merchandise which are known from actual display.

Auctions in consignment markets lead to advantageous purchasing. Grades and commodities found not to be suitable for the trade of the domestic market can be reexported without seriously hampering customs formalities.

In the United States we have a high protective tariff bearing on a wide range of raw materials and semimanufactured materials for further use in manufacturing. In 1920 the total dutiable imports of raw and semimanufactured materials, including foodstuffs, greatly exceeded $1,000,000,000. On manufactured products our manufacturers and merchants do not have the advantages of a consignment market. Our system of bonded warehouses has imposed certain handicaps on this class of business. The American manufacturer or merchant today has to negotiate at long range, often through foreign middlemen, for comparatively large quantities of dutiable merchandise. With free zones in the United States, where a broad consignment market could be built up, the American business men would have the advantages which European business men have, of negotiating in the ports of their home country for quick delivery of merchandise in amounts immediately desired and grades known by inspection. The American manufacturers would benefit by having stocks of dutiable supplies readily accessible and could buy in quantities as needed without tying up the large sums of money now tied up in carrying comparatively large stocks, by reason of the nonexistence of the facilities of a consignment market in the United States. As a diversified entrepôt and consignment business grows up in the United States it would direct to our markets a great many Latin-American and other buyers from abroad, who now do their buying in the established consignment markets in European centers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

THE CRISIS IN EDUCATION

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein an address delivered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] on May 13.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, on Mother's Day, May 13, 1934, of this year I listened with much enjoyment to a very fine speech delivered by Hon. Ross A. COLLINS, of Mississippi, over the NBC-WEAF network.

The program was sponsored by the National Educational Association of the United States. Dr. Belmont Farley, of that association and one of the outstanding leaders in the educational world, introduced Mr. COLLINS in these words:

INTRODUCTION BY MR. FARLEY

Among those leaders of Congress who have recognized the importance of education at all times is Ross A. COLLINS, of Mississippi. When he was first a candidate for Congress in 1920, he advocated "I favor additional Government aid for common schools, such aid to be expended by and at all times to be under the control of State authorities." He can be classified as a lifelong friend of the cause of education. We are, therefore, pleased to have Mr. COLLINS speak to you from the headquarters building of the National Education Association in Washington, D.C.

It was Mr. COLLINS who, a few years ago, secured the unanimous passage through both Houses of Congress of a bill to purchase the most famous library of all times, the Vollbehr collection, including the Gutenberg Bible on vellum, thereby preserving thousands of books of historical and cultural value published during the infancy period of printing.

Mr. COLLINS likewise helped to secure for the Library of Congress the Russian Czar's private library.

In recent months he has devoted much time effectively to providing emergency aid to the public schools. Every parent in the Nation is indebted to him for his efforts in behalf of their children.

Recently Congressman COLLINS was rated by Washington newspapermen as one of the eight Members of the House of Representatives possessing the most personal power and influence among their colleagues.

I am pleased to introduce to you Congressman Ross A. COLLINS, of Mississippi.

SPEECH OF MR. COLLINS

Free education is the United States' greatest contribution to civilization. Our forefathers realized that education is the very root and heart of our national existence and of our natural well-being. Our statesmen were impressed by the intimate relation existing between education and democracy, and today we fully realize that education is essential and, in fact, the first prerequisite for a democratic state. Democracy depends for its very existence and its efficient functioning on education. It, therefore, behooves us, during the strenuous upheaval through which we are passing, that we do not neglect the cornerstone of our democracy.

The national stock-taking of our educational facilities reveals several interesting facts. First, education is expensive but not extravagant. It is worth every cent put into it. Yet it does cost money and, therefore, during the period of economic depression—punctured by bankruptcies of all kinds, business and bank failures, unmarketable crops, unsalable land, and uncollectible taxes—certain economies in public expenditures became necessary, and educational appropriations suffered accordingly.

Until economic adversity overtook the Nation its record of education was an ever-expanding one. New school facilities and new responsibilities were annually being added to the American system of public education. Today this great record of new opportunities for our children has ceased to grow and has receded and shrunk with alarming rapidity.

Instead of new schools being opened old ones are being closed. In all States the school term has been drastically shortened. Thus pupils who would normally have entered high school at 14 may be 16 or 17 when they start to school. It is almost impossible to realize the significance of this retardation in the life of the boy and girl.

Again, the number of teachers, instead of increasing to take care of added enrollment is decreasing month by month. Last year, for example, 15,000 teachers were dismissed and one-third of those actually employed are existing on salaries below the subsistence level. Moreover, courses and opportunities offered to American children are becoming fewer and fewer. A crisis that is a real threat to our Nation and one which deeply concerns every thinking man and woman does indeed exist in our school system. We cannot be indifferent to an educational system that throws children of school age into the city streets.

Recently 32 great civic, labor, and patriotic organizations combined to form a committee to study this crisis. This committee on Federal emergency relief for education confirmed the findings of the United States Office of Education in a survey undertaken late last year. And these two studies have brought home to me with stark effectiveness the critical situation in our school system which has been uppermost in my thoughts and actions during the past 2 years.

This situation demands immediate action. It demands what I have advocated upon all occasions—Federal aid to the States and municipalities that cannot provide for their children complete, up-to-the-minute educational facilities. This Federal aid should be given directly to the States to be administered by the State school systems. There should be no extension of Federal control over our great State school organization. But adequate Federal funds, aggregating at least $100,000,000, should be provided by this Congress at once.

Figures are tiresome at best. But the figures that show the very real crisis in our schools are so significant as to demand the serious consideration of everyone.

Today more than one million children are in school only because Federal funds are keeping them there. Twenty thousand teachers are inculcating these children with the rudiments of learning and with the tenets of loyal citizenship because Federal funds have made it possible.

Through the liberalization of a Federal relief order, in which I am proud to say I played a small part, hundreds of rural schools have been able to finish their regular terms this spring.

That is the bright side of the picture.

When Federal aid ran out this spring, 140,000 children had to leave school because the schools closed. And unless ample Federal aid is forthcoming for the school year of 1934–35, it may be said without exaggeration that the happiness, the opportunities, and the training in citizenship of hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of children will be seriously affected if not totally wrecked.

Why is Federal aid so necessary? The report I have already mentioned tells how tax delinquencies have mounted, how school budgets have been cut and cut again, how more and more abatements of taxes are effected, how income for school uses has grown smaller and smaller, how States and municipalities have borrowed up to their limit, and how enrollments, due to the elimination of child labor, will increase next year.

No person who has given consideration to our crisis in education denies that virtually all of our States and many localities need Federal aid for their schools. In February, 44 State superintendents of instruction were asked whether Federal aid would be needed for the next year and all but 3 answered in the affirmative.

It must be remembered also that this aid was requested on the basis of the barest necessities in education. I am deeply moved when I think how all the fine advances and refinements and opportunities in our educational system have been practically swept away in the upheaval of the last few years. Kindergartens, nursery schools, art courses, manual and vocational training, night classes, music instruction, domestic science, and specialized work for students with marked aptitude—all of those advances have been cast overboard in the efforts of many school systems to give the minimum three R's under depression circumstances. Today these educational systems are fighting to keep in operation—they are, in truth, drowning men. Unless the Federal Government can give them aid the school year of 1934–35 will see hundreds of casualties in the educational world and hundreds of thousands of children denied their rights.

My message is this: Education is a necessity if this Government is to exist. It is our duty to provide this training for our children. It is the further duty of the Federal Government to see that this obligation is properly fulfilled when circumstances prevent the States and municipalities from fulfilling it.

Therefore, I contend that it would be a great catastrophe if proper and ample provision were not made by the Federal Government to preserve our whole system of public instruction in its entirety. I refuse to stand by and watch our growing generation denied their rights and opportunities. And with this resolution I pledge to you my unswerving service in behalf of our children, our schools, and our Nation.

FOREIGN-TRADE ZONES

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business for today is the passage of the bill (H.R. 9322) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANCHARD) there were—ayes 86, noes 42.

Mr. WOODRUFF and Mr. BLANCHARD rose.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 254, nays 95, answered "present" 2, not voting 80, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The doors were opened.

On motion of Mr. CULLEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a brief announcement at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] is necessarily absent today. If he were present, he would vote "aye" on this bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to ask the majority leader a question about the program.

Will the gentleman inform us whether we are to be in session tomorrow, and, if so, what the program will be for that day and, so far as the gentleman may know at this time, what will be the program for the balance of the week?

Mr. BYRNS. It is the expectation to be in session tomorrow, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, expects to call up the silver bill in the morning.

Mr. SNELL. That will probably take the major part of the day at least?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not know how long it will take.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman tell us what he expects to come up during the balance of the week?

Mr. BYRNS. It is impossible to say now. Of course, it is the purpose to give the appropriation bill the right-of-way as soon as it is reported, but I have not been able to get any definite information about when the committee will be ready to make its report. The same thing is true of the communications bill.

Mr. SNELL. Bills on the Private Calendar are to be considered tonight.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; and I may say to the gentleman that if the two bills to which I have referred are not reported, or are not ready for consideration, either conference reports or some of the rules that are now on the desk will be taken up for consideration.

Mr. SNELL. In the consideration of the Private Calendar today is preference to be given to bills passed by the Senate?

Mr. BYRNS. That was not the order of the House. Of course, if the House wants to take such action when it meets, that can be done.

Mr. SNELL. I think we really should take action before we meet, if any such action is going to be taken at all, so that the Members who attend the session tonight may have a definite understanding one way or the other.

Mr. BYRNS. I may say to the gentleman that it has been my purpose to ask the House to hold a session to consider solely Senate bills on the Private Calendar, but I thought it was a little early to make such a request this week, because Members who have House bills on the calendar should have the opportunity of having them considered by the House tonight.

Mr. SABATH. Does not the gentleman think it would be well if the Senate would consider some of the House bills before we act on the Senate bills?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I think that is a good suggestion.

Mr. BYRNS. I think that is true, and I presume they are doing that.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I think that is, perhaps, a rather violent presumption.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the majority leader tell us what is to be the program for the balance of the day?

Mr. BYRNS. I understand we have special orders which will consume 1 hour and 20 minutes and then there may be a conference report on the air mail called up by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD]. Then, I understand, it is the purpose to call up the conference report on the legislative bill, and after that, if there are no other conference reports, the Rules Committee proposes to take up a bill authorizing the District of Columbia to borrow money from the P.W.A. Then there is the bill with respect to prison-made goods, introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER]. I do not know whether we will conclude the consideration of all of them today or not.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to propound an inquiry to the majority leader and the minority leader about the program for this week. Is it the expectation to stay in session all of this week?

Mr. BYRNS. That is the expectation now.

Mr. RAYBURN. I had in mind the conference report on the stock exchange bill, which will go to the Senate this afternoon. I should certainly like to get that out of the way.

Mr. BYRNS. I hope the gentleman may call it up at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. RAYBURN. I also wanted to ask if it would not be possible to get up the communications bill early next week.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. BIERMANN. I understand the silver bill is coming up tomorrow.

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. Is the consideration of that bill to be completed at that time?

Mr. BYRNS. I may say to my friend that, of course, no one can tell whether the consideration of the silver bill will be concluded tomorrow or not. I hope it will be. I understand some of the gentlemen have made engagements for tomorrow on account of its being Memorial Day, and it is my purpose, if the consideration of the silver bill is concluded and the bill gets up to a vote, to ask the House to postpone the vote until Thursday, so as to give the gentlemen who may be absent an opportunity to be here. However, I cannot, of course, guarantee that this will be done.

Mr. BIERMANN. Does the gentleman expect that we will be in session on Saturday of this week?

Mr. BYRNS. At the present time I think so; but, of course, that is a matter for future consideration.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL—1935

Mr. LUDLOW submitted the following conference report on the bill (H.R. 8617) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 15, and the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 12 and 16 to the bill (H.R. 8617) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 15; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by such amendment of the House insert the sum "$443,880"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed by such amendment of the House insert the sum "$212,934"; and the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 15, and the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate nos. 12 and 16, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

The Senate amendments involve increases in compensation to six employees of the Senate involving a total of appropriations in this bill of $4,410. The managers on the part of the House have agreed to all of such amendments in the amounts and in the language contained in the Senate amendments.

In the adjustment of this difference between the two Houses involving the principle of the right of each House to determine the compensation of its own respective employees, the managers on the part of both Houses have reached an understanding that in the preparation of future bills carrying compensation of employees of Congress they will confer prior to the formulation and reporting of the bills in either House, with a view to reaching a joint understanding touching the matter of general policy to be pursued toward such compensation.

LOUIS LUDLOW,
WILLIAM J. GRANFIELD,
JOHN N. SANDLIN,
J. P. BUCHANAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas, Mr. BUCHANAN, chairman of the committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely essential that this conference report be agreed to now and the bill signed, so that it can go to the Senate, have the conference report agreed to by the Senate, and the bill reach the President before 12 o'clock tomorrow, when he leaves Washington.

The circumstances are that there are 4,000 employees in the Government Printing Office, and without this bill the authorities will have no money to pay their monthly salaries. They depend upon the monthly salary to pay for their daily bread. It would be unjust to postpone the conference report and make them go without their salaries on a difference between the two Houses of less than $5,000.

I will say that the conference committee made an agreement that this character of controversy will not arise in the future, if the agreement is lived up to. We agreed that on any future proposed increase of salaries the proper subcommittees of the House will confer and reach an understanding between the two Houses.

Mr. SINCLAIR. In all future differences between the two Houses?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; but on the differences arising before the bill is marked up as to the salary of employees. The two committees will confer and reach an agreement or policy as to the employees' salary.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. Does this bill carry an appropriation to take care of the difference in exchange for consular representatives?

Mr. BUCHANAN. A little over $7,000,000. That was adopted in the first conference on the bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Is this resolution the gentleman speaks of in relation to increase in salaries a continuing resolution or law between the two bodies?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is not a law; it is merely an agreement or understanding recorded in the report of this conference committee for future reference and future guidance. Of course, they can violate it, but I do not believe they will, for we have had too much trouble on this.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD].

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to call the attention of the House to the agreement just referred to by the chairman, because it is unprecedented. During the hearings in the House Committee it was learned that certain employees of the House were in line for increases in salary, and that the same condition prevailed in the Senate. It was decided at that time, and supported by the chairman of the full committee [Mr. BUCHANAN] that this was not the time to increase salaries, and if that question was to be considered, that it should be by a special resolution whereby a survey could be made by a special committee and all cases considered on their merits.

At the first meeting of the conferees it was tentatively agreed that the Senate should have additional employees, but promised no additional moneys to be appropriated for increase of salaries. I will ask the gentleman from Texas if that is correct?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is correct.

Mr. McLEOD. Then, later, the Senate conferees sidestepped and would not agree unless additional salaries were included. There are several House employees whom the House committee felt should receive increases in their salaries. We reluctantly agreed to let that go by this session. Then during the first consideration in the House of this bill, the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. LUDLOW] advised that there was such a resolution as I referred to a moment ago now pending, for a survey of this situation relative to increasing the salaries of employees of the House of Representatives. With the Senate having the additional places allotted, with no objection on the part of the House, with the House in the position that no increase in salaries will accrue to its own employees, we are now obliged, in order to cater to the Senate, to accede to their request. This is not necessary and we should stand pat. The chairman of the committee has pointed out that there are 4,000 employees of the Government Printing Office who have to be taken care of at once. They can be taken care of by a continuing resolution. That has been done before and it can be done now.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But the gentleman understands that it would be impossible to get a continuing resolution through both Houses between now and 12 o'clock tomorrow so that the President would have a chance to sign it.

Mr. McLEOD. Does not the chairman believe that such a resolution could be put through as quickly as this conference report?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; we would have to have an investigation and the report of the subcommittee and a meeting of the whole committee and reported to the House, where it would not have a privilege status, and then it would have to go from the House to the Senate, where the same procedure would be gone through.

Mr. McLEOD. Does not the chairman believe that this indicates a weakness on the part of the House in a situation such as this?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not. I believe that we have made substantial progress along the line that the House conferees started out to make. We have procured a solemn recorded agreement that they will confer with the House committee before any other bill is reported by either House covering increase of salaries, and adopt and agree upon a policy to be pursued regarding the salaries of employees of Congress.

Mr. McLEOD. The chairman knows that this bill has been in conference more than 4 weeks. A continuing resolution could have been introduced and passed a long time ago, and this weakness that we are now about to admit would have been avoided.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Would the gentleman deprive 4,000 men of their weekly or daily or monthly salary just on a squabble over less than $5,000 between the two Houses?

Mr. McLEOD. The gentleman is an authority on this question, and he knows that it would not deprive those employees of a penny.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I certainly know it would.

Mr. McLEOD. A continuing resolution could be put through both Houses if we insisted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, a continuing resolution could be put through for everything.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I rose merely to call this situation to the attention of the House. I trust we can find ways and means so that we may not be obliged to continue to bow to the Senate.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, this is an exigent situation that we are facing. Day after tomorrow, unless we take this action, about 4,000 employees of the Government Printing Office will be camping at our doors. As a matter of fact, instead of displaying weakness, we have made a good fight and have secured the establishment, I think, of a very great principle, and that principle is that the Senate hereafter will make no increases in the salaries of their personnel without first consulting the chosen representatives of the lower branch of Congress on the Committee on Appropriations. I think that fight has been worth while, and I think the result is very important. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to; and a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

OATHS TO APPLICANTS FOR TAX-EXEMPTION CERTIFICATES, COTTON CONTROL ACT

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 123, empowering certain agents authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to administer oaths to applicants for tax-exempt certificates under the Cotton Act of 1934.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 123, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk reported the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Is this satisfactory to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE]?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I have had the matter up with him. All it does is simply to authorize the county and community committees to take affidavit from these applicants.

Mr. SNELL. And this will make it easier to carry out the Cotton Act?

Mr. JONES. I hope so.

Mr. SNELL. Then I am for it.

Mr. JONES. I thank the gentleman for his consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 123

Resolved, etc., That any county agent or member of a county committee or community committee of a cotton-production-control association who is authorized in writing by the Secretary of Agriculture to act as his agent in the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act shall, while he is acting as such agent, have power to administer oaths to persons making applications (if made within the county in which such agent is authorized to act) for tax-exemption certificates under section 6 of the act of April 21, 1934, entitled "An act to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agriculture Adjustment Act, and for other purposes", but no fee or compensation shall be charged or received by any such agent for administering such an oath.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

WORK OF THIS CONGRESS

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, the present session of Congress is drawing to a close, and I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to make a few remarks concerning the work done by the administration and Congress.

When President Franklin D. Roosevelt was inaugurated March 4, 1933, we were standing on the brink of disaster, and it was necessary that something be done and done at once. Under the wise and able leadership of the President, Congress passed the National Recovery Act, which authorized appropriations in the sum of $3,300,000,000 for construction projects throughout the United States to put people to work. Congress and the administration did not have time for prolonged discussion and debate, as immediate action was necessary. We had to try something, and this bill was enacted with notable results, providing work for millions of our former idle and unemployed.

Congress then passed the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which increased the prices of farm products. Many would probably have approached this question from a different angle, but we were all working together and doing the best we could. This bill also provided for refinancing farm loans to the amount of $2,000,000,000. When this bill was considered in the House I offered an amendment providing for the issuance of sound currency instead of nontaxable bonds, because that is unnecessary and fills the coffers of the money changers of the country with billions of unearned dollars. This bill also provided for inflation of the currency at the discretion of the President.

Against the wishes and objections of the international bankers, the President took the United States off the gold standard and that without consulting other nations. America can legislate for her people without the advice of other nations. President Roosevelt has gone further than any other President since Andrew Jackson toward restoring our Government to the people. These same international bankers, who have in the past controlled the money and credits of the United States, also opposed the remonetization of silver, but they are going to be overridden on that, the same as they were on the gold standard. The question of the issuance and control of money is going to be placed back in Congress, as provided in the Constitution.

In addition to supporting the Agricultural Adjustment Act, I also, for the benefit of agriculture, supported the Frazier bill which would provide for the refinancing of farm mortgages by the issuance of Federal Reserve notes to pay these mortgages at 1½-percent principal and 1½-percent interest per annum over a long period of years. In my judgment, a bill with these provisions will be passed in the near future. I believe that the only way the farmers can eventually pay out of debt is by being given a long time and a small rate of interest. This rate of interest would more than pay for the cost of administration. I introduced a bill to liberalize the provisions of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for the benefit of home owners who live in towns, along the same lines as the Frazier bill. This provides for the issuance of Treasury notes or currency against the home mortgages to pay the indebtedness at not more than 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal per annum over a long period of time.

Before we can recover from this depression, it is necessary that agriculture be rehabilitated. When we have a prosperous agriculture, there is no depression, and every citizen is benefited.

I am also joint author of the Swank-Thomas bill, which provides that farmers shall receive not less than the cost of production for crops consumed in this country, plus a reasonable profit. The Frazier bill, my home owners' bill, and the Swank-Thomas bill are supported by the National Farmers Union of the United States and many other citizens and organizations.

I have always favored remonetization of silver in order to provide a broader basis for the issuance of currency, which is necessary for the business of the country. I helped prepare the Dies silver bill, as it was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, of which I am a member. We passed this bill through the House and it is now pending in the Senate. This bill will open the markets of the silver-producing countries of the world for the purchase of our farm products.

I voted against giving $20,000,000 to Russia, which was done in a previous administration, and opposed the settlement of the French debt which canceled $2,000,000,000 that country owes us, and also opposed the Italian debt settlement which canceled $1,500,000,000 due from that country to us. Foreign governments owe us $12,000,000,000, and I am opposed to any cancelation or reduction of these debts. They were contracted in good faith with our people and the contracts of nations should be kept the same as individuals.

The mother and the home are the foundation of our Government and we should do everything possible to protect them. I have supported all legislation for bettering the conditions of our women and children and supported the child labor amendment to prevent the employment of children in occupations detrimental to their health and welfare. My bill providing Federal aid for public schools has been endorsed by many of the leading educators in Oklahoma and numerous school boards and parent-teacher associations. I appeared before the Committee on Education in support of the bill and also spoke on the floor of the House in its behalf. Since the bill was introduced, larger appropriations have been made for emergency school work.

I have always supported old-age pensions and in the Seventy-second Congress and in this Congress introduced a bill for that purpose. This would prevent many old people from being separated in their declining years and would not cost as much as the present system of almshouses.

When the people sent me to Congress, Platt National Park at Sulphur was receiving an appropriation of $7,500 per year. The first year I had this increased to $10,000, and for this year the appropriation is $28,500, in addition to $76,000 allocated by the Civil Works Administration. The Agricultural Adjustment Administration has paid to Oklahoma more than $16,000,000, and it is estimated that more than $31,000,000 will be received this year. Rental and benefit payments on cotton for 1933 in each of the seven counties of the Fifth Congressional District of Oklahoma amounted to the following:

Payne County	$136,066.50
Logan County	973,377.50
Oklahoma County	69,954.28
Cleveland County	72,852.00
McClain County	219,022.25
Garvin County	230,329.87
Murray County	63,533.50

Of the 26 conservation camps in Oklahoma, I succeeded in having 8 of them established in the Fifth Congressional District.

The total cotton payments to the State for 1933 amounted to the sum of $11,595,657.46, and benefit payments for wheat amounted to $1,149,863.80, or the total sum of $12,745,521.26.

The Civil Works and Federal Relief Administrations have paid over $19,000,000 to Oklahoma the past year. We have also appropriated and allocated for public roads in Oklahoma more than $10,000,000, and for the Public Works Administration more than $19,000,000. We have appropriated $2,775,000 for Indian welfare in Oklahoma. All these amounts help our recovery program.

My bill became a law, which provided for the Circuit Court of Appeals to sit in Oklahoma City, and afterward we passed a law creating the tenth circuit which holds sessions of the court at that place. I also introduced a bill which became a law establishing a Federal court at Pauls Valley. I secured Federal buildings for Norman and Stillwater, an appropriation for a building at Cushing, and assisted in getting the large appropriation for the new Federal building at Oklahoma City. Other cities in the district will receive Federal buildings in the near future.

I have worked for universal peace and legislation that will, in the event of another war, if men are drafted, draft capital also. We must take the profits out of war. Legislation to promote these ends is now being considered by Congress.

When the Democrats organized the House of Representatives in the Seventy-second Congress, Speaker Garner did me the honor of calling me, the first Democrat from Oklahoma, to preside over the House after he became Speaker. I have also presided in the present Congress. I am next to the chairman on the Public Lands Committee and third in rank on the Flood Control Committee. I am also a member of the Committee on Claims and the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. Flood control is one of the most important committees in Congress, and especially for Oklahoma and the West.

I secured an appropriation providing for the broadcasting of livestock and crop reports from Oklahoma City and also established a port of entry there, which is a great convenience to our merchants. Lately Oklahoma City has been made district headquarters for the Interior Department, which has charge of conservation camps.

Some of the big papers and special interests criticized those who voted to override the President's veto on the independent offices appropriation bill affecting disabled veterans. These charges were not only unfair but untrue. Some of the articles stated that we voted to increase our salaries. The provision in the act which reduced Federal salaries 15 percent expires June 30, 1934, and without additional legislation this reduction would have been restored in full. A vote to sustain the veto was a vote to restore the entire reduction and a vote to override was a vote against full restoration of salaries. Under this amendment salaries will be restored 5 percent February 1 and 5 percent July 1, leaving a 5-percent reduction, which would not have been the case had the veto been sustained. Instead of voting to increase our salaries I voted against a restoration, and also voted for the Borah amendment which was offered in the House, and which amendment would have prevented any increase in salaries above $6,000, which would have included salaries of Members of Congress. The people are not as easily fooled as some think.

The amount which the appropriation was increased is not $228,000,000, as some stated. The bill will carry an increase for veterans of $20,000,000 above the recommendations of the President and $63,000,000 for Federal employees, making a total increase of $83,000,000. The chief controversy was around 29,000 presumptive cases of tuberculosis and mental. The bill, as passed, will restore these 29,000 pitiful cases to the compensation rolls, and will not leave it to a board to act arbitrarily. My vote was to place the burden of proof upon the Government instead of upon these disabled veterans. I have always supported legislation for the benefit of our disabled veterans and their dependents, and shall continue to do so.

This vote was not a question of voting for or against the President. In the House 210 Democrats voted to override the veto, including many committee chairmen. The chairman of the steering committee and other administration leaders and friends of the President voted to override the veto. In the Senate 29 Democrats voted to override the veto and 27 voted to sustain. In addition to these stalwart Democrats voting to override the veto, the three leading Progressives voted likewise, namely, Senators NORRIS, JOHNSON, and CUTTING. They all supported the President in his campaign and are supporting him now. No one will accuse any of these men of selfishness or disloyalty. The President of the United States is a big man and accords every Member of Congress the right to vote as his conscience dictates. No one thinks more of the President than I do, and I have supported his recovery program, including the National Recovery Administration, Agricultural Adjustment Administration, Public Works, and other legislation.

This bill did some measure of justice to the veterans, but, as stated before, its passage prevented a complete restoration of Federal salaries.

An appropriation of $3,300,000,000 was made for the N.R.A. and a few days before this veto was acted upon $284,658,799 was appropriated for the Navy and $354,781,899 for the Army. Therefore, $20,000,000 for these disabled and helpless veterans will not unbalance the Budget.

Those who have heretofore profited by special legislation, like the profiteers during the World War, of course, are opposed to any Congressman who does not take their orders and they will try to defeat such Congressmen. I have always supported legislation that I thought was for the best interests of the people whom I have the honor to represent, and that shall continue to be my course as long as the people of the Fifth Congressional District of Oklahoma keep me in Congress.

EXCISE TAX ON PHILIPPINE COCONUT OIL

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the message sent by the President yesterday concerning the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the President of the United States sent a message to Congress expressing his opposition to the excise tax on Philippine coconut oil as provided in section 602 of the recently enacted revenue act, and urging the appropriate remedial legislation.

In the name of the legislature and people of the Philippines, I wish to register my profound gratitude for the President's message. It is a message that is at once a call to Congress to uphold the terms of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, Public, No. 127, Seventy-third Congress, and a notice to the Filipino people that they can rely on the sense of justice and reasonableness of the American Government.

I hasten, therefore, to ask Congress to accede to the President's request that the coconut-oil provision in the revenue act be reconsidered, repealing the tax forthwith, while a more objective study of the question is made between now and next January with a view to formulating a solution that would be more equitable and satisfactory all around.

Mr. Speaker, my faith in President Franklin D. Roosevelt includes a belief in his genius to read correctly the mind of the American people and to do what they would want done in any given problem before the Nation. I am morally sure his present message will receive their approval, and they will urge its translation into positive legislation once they know the facts and the equities upon which it is predicated. And when it is borne in mind that the present case involves the doing of justice to a dependent people, the 14,000,000 wards of America living half way around the globe, the action of the President in the premises acquires a patent of nobility.

There were two outstanding facts in the question. One involves national policy and the other economic considerations.

On March 23 last, only 9 weeks ago, Congress, with overwhelming majorities in both Houses, passed the Tydings-McDuffie Independence Act. It sets forth in detail the terms and conditions precedent to the achievement of complete Philippine independence. Under it the Philippines assume heavy economic sacrifices in the form of tonnage limitations without compensation and export duties to meet the government-bonded obligations to American banks.

As described by President Roosevelt, the Independence Act is an offer of solution of the Philippine problem formally and deliberately made by the Government of the United States to the people of the Philippines. The offer, Mr. Speaker, was as formally and deliberately accepted by unanimous vote of the Philippine Legislature on May 1, the thirty-sixth anniversary of Admiral Dewey's glorious victory in Manila Bay and 5 weeks after the offer was made. The President of the United States has notified the Congress of the action of the Philippine Legislature.

Now what do we find? Even before the initial step in the organization of the new Philippine government is taken, Congress has already approved a law imposing an excise tax on our coconut oil, a tax that is one and a half times as much as the article sold last year in New York, a tax that is an effective embargo, a clear confiscation, a cruel deprivation of the livelihood of fully a quarter of the entire Philippine population.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we protest against a treatment so oppressive and so inconsistent. We would be hopelessly recreant to our elemental duty did we do an iota less. The American people will hear our appeals and our supplications, and I am confident they will heed us and bid their Government to give us the old-fashioned American square deal.

Not a word of ingratitude to America will escape from my lips, for my soul wills it so, but I certainly cannot understand how the noble and benevolent America which has been our friend, mentor, and benefactor for the last 36 years should now turn so sharply against us during the short time left before we Filipinos finally bid a grateful farewell to the American flag under which we have lived in security and contentment for over a third of a century.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct particular attention to the possible effects of the excise tax law upon the independence legislation.

The tax will annihilate a major industry in the Philippines. The resulting poverty and misery may give rise to civil disturbance which may necessitate the armed forces of the United States to suppress. What does this mean? This means bloodshed, hatred, expenditures of money, destruction of property, and possible overthrow of the constituted government. In other words, Congress will, unwittingly but efficaciously destroy what it proposes to build with the Independence Act. Therefore, I ask, prayerfully ask, the entire Membership of this deliberative body to pause and survey the mischievous possibilities of the situation.

The enactment of the excise tax law gets sets a precedent for similar corrosive and oppressive laws with respect to other Philippine products. Judging by the bills which have already been presented in this Congress, our other industries are due for some rough treatment. And what can we do to resist it? We do not have the power to adopt retaliatory measures. That power Congress has not given us, so we are entirely at its mercy. Neither do we have the power to conclude commercial treaties with foreign countries, and that is why we cannot find substantial markets abroad for our products. Does not the American Government see that it is putting the Philippines in an economic straitjacket?

With all these unpleasant consequences to the Filipino people, I am afraid the American farmer will benefit not at all. The proscription of coconut oil will not bring an additional dollar a year to him. He will lose a market for some of his products in the Philippines. And he may find that in slaughtering the coconut-oil industry he may be giving life to new foreign industries that can give him real competition.

However, the American bondholders seem to be safe. To pay them, the Philippine Commonwealth government, after the sixth year of its existence, is directed to collect export duties to pay the government bonded indebtedness. If the payment is defaulted the American High Commissioner shall take over the administration of the Philippine customs offices and do the collecting himself. That situation, which smacks of the much-criticized cases of Haiti and Santo Domingo, will surely come to pass if Philippine industries are not given a chance to live, for it is these industries which provide our government with its revenue.

The Filipino people, Mr. Speaker, are entitled to a fair chance to make the government which they will establish under the Tydings-McDuffie Act work smoothly and successfully. But what chance are you giving them? Let me answer in all candor and in all loyalty. You are putting a monkey wrench in the machinery of government which they are trying to put together under circumstances which are already difficult and burdensome. You are digging with the excise tax law the grave for the Independence Act. You are giving the Filipino people mighty little chance to succeed with their new venture in self-government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall ask that certain letters which I addressed to the President of the United States and typical communications to various Members of Congress pertinent to the question I am discussing be printed immediately after the foregoing remarks. These letters discuss the economic questions involved in the excise tax, and I invite their perusal by Members.

I now close with an appeal to you, the constitutional Representatives of the American people, to take up the message of President Roosevelt and translate his recommendations into law. The Filipino people are your friends and admirers. They are your wards and protégés. They are still under your flag. They revere that flag and love the institutions and the principles for which it stands. Mr. Speaker, I bespeak the continued generosity of the American people to my people.

APRIL 14, 1934.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D.C.
(Through the Secretary of War.)

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Following my conference today with the Secretary of War on the excise tax on Philippine coconut oil, I am leaving this letter with him with the request that he be good enough to submit it to your distinguished consideration.

I desire to associate myself with Your Excellency, the Secretary of War, and various Members of Congress in declaring that the excise tax in question is a violation of the terms, the spirit, and the plan of the Tydings-McDuffie Act, which the American Government has just offered the Filipino people as their new organic law and as the covenant that shall govern the political and economic relations between the United States and the Philippines before complete Philippine independence is achieved.

If such violation is permitted to stand, I am afraid it would set a precedent for similar violations respecting other Philippine products, and that would simply mean inaugurating in the Philippines while still under the American flag the reign of poverty and penury, chaos and confusion, uncertainty and more uncertainty.

Philippine industries would be destroyed before they could even start an orderly readjustment, which in itself is a mighty difficult operation, from the present tariff-protected to the unprotected basis during the 10-year transition period contemplated in the Tydings-McDuffie Act.

Mr. President, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show, the coconut-oil excise tax has been posed as a question of the American farmer versus the Filipino farmer, and Members of Congress were frank in saying that they were for the former. As the Philippines have no vote in Congress and not even a voice in the Senate, it was to be expected that a more judicial attitude would be taken on questions affecting the Philippines.

There are proofs overwhelming that between American agriculture and the Philippines there are infinitely more points of harmony and mutual benefit than competition and conflict. What is needed is a calm examination of their mutual interests.

In the debate in the Senate it was repeatedly stated that taxing the Philippine coconut oil is merely placing the Filipino copra producer on a comparable basis with the American farmer with respect to the processing tax under the A.A.A. May I point out the difference between the two cases by saying that the processing tax accrues directly to the American farmer, while the coconut-oil excise tax goes to the Philippine government, which, under the Norris amendment, is prohibited from subsidizing the coconut industry under penalty of forfeiting the tax.

The provision to give the tax that may be collected to the Philippine government does nothing but raise false hopes for more revenue. The rate of 3 cents a pound is equivalent to 130 percent ad valorem. The steep price increase would inevitably force the consumption of coconut oil in American industries to the very minimum. We have the word of the proponents of the tax that coconut oil is not indispensable except in certain industries which use perhaps less than 5 percent of the coconut oil now consumed.

The net effect of the tax would be to reduce the coconut-oil and copra exports of the Philippines to the United States to a very small proportion of the present amounts, and the corresponding increase of copra surplus in the Philippines for disposal at depressed prices in the markets of the world.

The Filipino copra producer would get less from his product than he is getting now, which is already near the starvation basis; and the Philippine government would not get the revenue, but instead would probably be the loser as its present substantial income from the sales tax on copra and coconut oil suffers considerable diminution.

I am, therefore, urging you to take the necessary action not only to save a major industry in the Philippines but also to save the Tydings-McDuffie Act from virtual disintegration.

Faithfully yours,

PEDRO GUEVARA,
Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands.

SECTION 602 OF THE REVENUE BILL 1934 AS AGREED UPON IN CONFERENCE BETWEEN THE HOUSE AND THE SENATE

The draft of section 602 proposed by the conference between the House and the Senate is no less a violation of our obligations under the Philippine Independence Act than were the drafts of the section in the House bill and in the Senate bill.

It is said that the conferees' proposal is favorable to the Philippines in that it gives them a monopoly in the sale of copra and coconut oil in the American market. The 2-cent preference on coconut oil, however, is merely a gesture and will not result in any real benefits to the Philippine producers:

(a) The tax of 3 cents on this Philippine product will reduce materially the consumption of coconut oil in the United States and thereby reduce the market to which the Philippine producers are entitled under the provisions of the Independence Act.

(b) Palm-kernel oil and other oils are to bear the same tax as that imposed upon Philippine coconut oil. Palm-kernel oil from Africa competes directly with coconut oil. The conferees' proposal gives the Philippine coconut oil no monopoly since it has no advantage in competition with palm-kernel oil.

(c) Babassu-nut oil, cohune-nut oil, and coquito-nut oil are exempt from the tax; and so far as they are available, they will undersell Philippine coconut oil in the American market.

(d) The Norris amendment which returns the tax to the Philippine treasury is no advantage to the producers of copra and coconut oil in the Philippines, since the amendment states that if the Philippine government provides for any subsidy to be paid to the producers of copra and coconut oil, the provisions of the amendment shall become null and void.

The issue remains as it was before the conference met: Whether or not the American Government is going to recognize its obligations assumed under the Philippine Independence Act and under treaties with foreign nations.

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 22, 1934.

Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR NORRIS: Inspired by your well-earned reputation for fairness and reasonableness, I wish to engage your attention on the effect of the Norris coconut amendment to the revenue bill upon the coconut industry of the Philippines.

I am convinced that you want to do justice to the Filipino. I am equally convinced that you want to secure justice for the American farmer. To you, therefore, it is not a question of wrong against right but rather one of right against right, which is the more difficult question to conscientious men like your good self.

The Norris coconut amendment, I am sure, is the expression of what you consider right and fair to the parties concerned.

Will you allow me to state that the Norris amendment will work terrible havoc with the Philippine coconut industry, impoverishing 4,000,000 Filipinos, endangering law and order and shattering the simple faith of the people in the goodness and fairness of the American Government.

These deplorable consequences are rendered more poignant and oppressive when it is considered that the coconut industry means so much to the Filipino people while its destruction will bring so little benefit to American agriculture.

The 3-cent tax on coconut oil is equivalent to 130 percent ad valorem. Since, according to the tax proponents, coconut oil is not indispensable in American industries except perhaps to the extent of 5 percent, the tax would push the price of the article up to a level that would make its use prohibitive. That could only mean that thenceforth coconut-oil imports from the Philippines would be reduced to but an infinitesimal portion of the present volume.

That must be the expectation of the tax proponents, for they did not deem it necessary to place a tonnage restriction in the Norris amendment. Indeed, the tax would be more effective than restriction, for it would operate as an embargo.

The tariff duty is not a real protection for Philippine coconut oil in the United States, for copra, from which coconut oil is expressed, is free from foreign countries, and there is a copra-crushing industry in this country.

The Filipino copra producer, Senator, is not placed by the Norris amendment on a comparable basis with the American farmer under the A.A.A., for, while the processing tax accrues to the American farmer, the excise tax does not go to the Filipino copra producer but to the Philippine government, which is prohibited under the amendment from subsidizing the coconut industry under penalty of forefeiting the tax.

And the Philippine government will not get any revenue either, for with coconut-oil consumption in America reduced to the vanishing point, where will the revenue come from? On the contrary, the Philippine government will likely suffer reduction in its income from the coconut industry under the Norris amendment through the diminution in the revenue from the sales tax collected on copra and coconut oil exported to the United States.

After losing the American market, the woe of the Filipino copra producer is not finished. What will happen to the coconuts which no human law can stop the trees from producing. They will form tremendous copra surpluses which will have to be disposed of at distress prices in the world markets if they can be disposed of at all. That would reduce the income of the Filipino copra producer to the starvation level. It would, moreover, demoralize the price structure of vegetable oils in the world markets, and that would affect adversely American competitive exports abroad and otherwise produce depressing repercussions on the fats and oils markets in the United States.

In the debate in Congress the fact that the balance of trade between the United States and the Philippines was against the United States in 1932 was taken as a further justification for the imposition of the tax and presumably and logically the stoppage of the copra and coconut-oil imports from the Philippines. The trade statistics tell but half of the story. The unfavorable trade balance is almost entirely offset by the invisible items which move between the two countries.

Senator, press dispatches from Manila say that the Filipinos will accept in the next 2 or 3 weeks the Tydings-McDuffie Independence Act, which the American Government has offered them. The act sets forth the terms of the relationship between the United States and the Philippines. The Filipinos consider those terms as the solemn word of America, which if altered in the future would be for the purpose of assuring more liberalism to the Filipino people.

Is it too sanguine to hope that America will consider the Tydings-McDuffit Act as obligatory as a treaty? I appeal to you, Senator, to give the Filipinos a chance to enjoy a measure of economic peace during the difficult period of preparation for their final independence. I beg of you not to pit the American farmer against the lowly Filipino copra producer. I plead with you to do justice by the Filipino people while they are still under the American flag.

Repeating what I said at the outset, I am emboldened to tell you my thoughts on this coconut-oil tax question with frankness and confidence, for I consider you as a bulwark of square dealing, civic courage, and humanitarian sentiments.

Faithfully yours,

PEDRO GUEVARA,
Resident Commissioner from the Philippines.

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 2, 1934.

Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
Chairman Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: As the Senate starts consideration of the revenue bill today, I cannot overcome the fear that the final fate of the Tydings-McDuffie Act may be involved in section 602 of the bill taxing Philippine coconut oil.

With the tax, the coconut-oil quota under the Tydings-McDuffie Act may as well be reduced from 200,000 to 50,000 tons. And with the precedent established, the economic readjustment contemplated under the act may become a series of violent business convulsions.

Self-preservation and self-respect would be too strong in any people to acquiesce in such unjustifiable sacrifices. The Filipino people do think of their economic well-being, and they crave for a modicum of fair treatment, and I am confident that even in these hectic times America will not fail them.

Senator, we naturally turn to you in an earnest appeal to labor mightily, as is your habit, for the integrity of the week-old legislation that bears your distinguished name. The challenge to you, sir, if I may presume to express it, is to save the Tydings-McDuffie Act from corrosive laws like section 602 of the pending revenue bill.

Your work, Senator, for the new Philippine organic law has retinted the political horizon of the Filipino people in bright colors. But that is not all you have achieved. You have convinced my people that they have in you a real friend and benefactor. You have, moreover, effected the reconciliation of warring Filipino political factions. And you have salvaged with your deft hands from the legislative scrap heap a measure which it took 18 months to elaborate and complete, and gave it a new lease of life.

With so much at stake, with so much to jeopardize, it would be a superfluity to call on you to take up the fight for the Filipino people. I am sure you will do it without any urging from us. And, needless to say, you have our best wishes and our undivided support. Your fight, sir, as is our fight, is to keep intact the plan, the genius, and the ultimate aim of the Tydings-McDuffie Act.

Faithfully yours,

PEDRO GUEVARA,
Resident Commissioner from the Philippines.

WASHINGTON, April 17, 1934.

Hon. PAT HARRISON,
Chairman Finance Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HARRISON: I hope that upon the reconsideration of the revenue bill the Norris coconut amendment may be substituted by your amendment which exempts a certain quantity of Philippine coconut oil from the excise tax fixed in section 602 of the bill.

Theoretically, the Norris amendment would be a godsend to the Philippines, for it would raise the price levels of copra and coconut oil, besides giving to the Philippine government an additional annual revenue of some $15,000,000, a sum that is more than 50 percent of the total income of that government from taxation.

Actually, it would do just the opposite thing. It would force the consumption to the indispensable minimum, and according to the proponents of the tax coconut oil is indispensable only in certain technical industries which use perhaps less than 5 percent of the present total consumption. It would, consequently, increase the copra surplus in the islands which must be disposed of in the already arid markets of the world at distress prices, thereby causing demoralization and depression in the world's price levels, a fact which would inevitably produce unfavorable repercussions in the oils and fats price structures in the United States.

So the net result would be that the Filipino copra producer would get less for his product under the Norris amendment than what he is getting now, which already borders on the starvation line, and the Philippine government would receive a great disillusionment, for the $15,000,000 revenue bonanza would not be forthcoming as there would be but a small amount of copra and coconut-oil exports to the United States from the Philippines.

Senator, I don't want to make an unreasonable request in this connection. Your amendment exempts 520,000,000 pounds a year of Philippine coconut oil from the tax. That amount is the average of the depression years. A more normal figure is 600,000,000 pounds, which roughly represents the amount imported in 1933.

As better times have started for the American people, may I prayerfully bespeak for the Filipino people the continuation of America's generosity as we move toward the day of separation as planned under the Tydings-McDuffie Act?

Faithfully yours,

PEDRO GUEVARA,
Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands.

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 3, 1934.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR PITTMAN: I cannot resist the apprehension that the final fate of the new Philippine organic law, the Tydings-McDuffie Act, may hinge upon the action of the Senate on the question of taxing coconut oil under section 602 of the pending revenue bill.

The tax of 3 cents a pound is still more than 100 percent of the price received for the commodity on the Atlantic seaboard. Without a doubt the tax is a much heavier burden than the tonnage limitation contained in the Tydings-McDuffie Act. It will at once reduce our coconut-oil exports to the United States by at least one-half, diminishing substantially as the months go by.

So even before the inauguration of the projected Philippine Commonwealth a major industry in the islands would be dislocated and incapacitated to effect a readjustment in an orderly and successful manner.

I am apprehensive not only of the tax itself but the precedent it will set. What if our other products are similarly taxed? And, in fairness to the industry concerned, why should coconut oil be singled out for a special tax burden? Why not sugar also? And what special privilege has cordage to be immune? And what about other Philippine products which are heavily tariff protected but are not even placed under a tonnage restriction under the Tydings-McDuffie Act?

As you know, Senator, I am for the Tydings-McDuffie Act and its parent legislation, the Hawes-Cutting Act. I want it to be accepted by the Filipino people. I want them to know that their friends in Congress prepared it and passed it, spending more than 18 months in the work.

And so I don't want to see any legislation that will vitiate the atmosphere around the new organic law. I don't want the Filipino people to get the idea that Congress has become so hostile to them that even before their expected commonwealth comes into being they will be thrown into an economic holocaust through the enactment of corrosive and oppressive laws like the proposed tax on their coconut oil.

I therefore appeal to you most earnestly and most solemnly to let the Congress know from the floor of the Senate the serious and far-flung implications of section 602 of the pending revenue bill insofar as it relates to Philippine coconut oil.

Faithfully yours,

PEDRO GUEVARA.

Hon. JOHN H. OVERTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR OVERTON: Thank you very much for your letter of March 28. You stated that coconut oil offers a "disastrous competition with cotton and cottonseed oil." Permit me to comment with pertinent facts and figures. I am sure you want to be fair both to American and insular industries.

Over 98 percent of cottonseed oil is used in edible compounds, while 70 percent of coconut oil goes to the soap kettle. It is true that about two decades ago cottonseed oil was used in soap but is now displaced by coconut oil. The displacement has been a good thing to the cottonseed oil. From the soap kettle the oil went to the edible field where it commands much better prices and encounters less competition. It is, therefore, a case of the coconut oil kicking cottonseed oil upstairs.

Of course, you will readily agree that increasing the production of cottonseed oil, which is but a byproduct of cotton, would bring disaster to the cotton industry, upsetting the entire administration program to help that industry under the A.A.A.

The Philippines bought in 1932, a severe depression year, over $10,000,000 worth of American cotton goods. May I suggest that there is infinitely more of mutual benefit than conflict between the American cotton farmer and the Philippines?

Faithfully yours,

PEDRO GUEVARA.

APRIL 3, 1934.

Hon. THOMAS P. GORE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR GORE: Please accept my profound thanks for your letter of March 31, answering mine of the 26th, regarding coconut oil and the proposal to tax it under the revenue bill.

Permit me to salute a real, thoroughgoing Jeffersonian Democrat incarnated in your person. We Filipinos who depend on the sense of justice and fairness of the American people look up to you to champion our reasonable causes in the American Congress, and I hope and trust that when the proposal to tax Philippine coconut oil comes up for debate today or tomorrow, you will let your voice be heard against the proposal.

I am sure American statesmanship can do something, like the suggestion contained in your letter, that will at once meet the reasonable desires of your constituents and save the Filipino people from suffering and impoverishment.

May I submit just one thought. Cottonseed oil is but a byproduct of cotton. To increase its production would imperil the administration program of acreage curtailment of cotton. Besides, over 98 percent of cottonseed oil is used in edible compounds, while 70 percent of coconut oil is used in the soap industry. If coconut oil has driven cottonseed oil out of the soap kettle, the former has gone into a field where it commands better prices and has less competition. In the vernacular, "coconut oil has kicked cottonseed oil upstairs."

Faithfully yours,

PEDRO GUEVARA.

STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

By PEDRO GUEVARA, Philippine Resident Commissioner

THE PHILIPPINE COCONUT-OIL TAX AND ITS IMPLICATIONS

On March 22 Congress passed a new organic law for the Philippines, the Tydings-McDuffie Act, and 2 days afterward it was signed by President Roosevelt.

Tomorrow the Senate will consider taxing Philippine coconut oil under the revenue bill at 3 cents a pound, a tax that is more than 100 percent of its price.

This will precipitate two results:

First, it will dynamite the Tydings-McDuffie Act, which is now pending for acceptance in the Philippines, by injecting into that new covenant of Philippine-American relations changes that will make the economic sacrifices of the Filipino people, which are already heavy, well-nigh unbearable.

Second, it will destroy the coconut industry in the islands, upon which, as Governor General Frank Murphy reports, fully a quarter of the population of the Philippines depend for their livelihood.

Therefore I ask: Is it not colossal inconsistency for the Congress to give the Filipino people a new organic law and, before the President's signature has dried, penalize the recipient with additional burdens and oppressive inflictions, thereby exposing the week-old law itself, its philosophy and its objective, to disintegration? It looks like giving the Filipino people a boon accompanied with a bomb.

DUTY OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by myself to Republican Builders at Town Hall, New York City, May 22, 1934:

I take particular pleasure in appearing before you tonight, for the foundation and development of your organization has been to me one of the most encouraging signs of the times. I am one of the small group now in Congress who has been characterized by an eloquent Member on the majority side as "an almost extinct relic of a fast-dying regime." I have had to sit in my place day after day and watch the steam roller pass over me. I have had to realize that the most earnest and strenuous opposition to dangerous legislation not only is ineffectual, but can hardly be made vocal. I have seen steady encroachment on American liberties by legislative enactment, all in the name of the new deal and the Democratic Party.

We of the Republican Party, who still remain in Congress, and the members of your organization can be of great mutual advantage to each other. We are in a particularly good position to see the wheels go round, evaluate the trends of the administration as typified by the pressure exerted for or against legislation and then report back to you. You can help us bring the truth home to the American people for I have enough confidence in the American people to believe that if they once know the truth, their course of action will be sound. We and those of our party around the country who are expecting next fall to cut down the huge Democratic majorities in the House and Senate must go on the firing line very soon and we want the help of every one of you in disseminating our principles and our policies.

I often think that the years of the depression, bitter though they may be, have rendered a great service to the cause of popular government. When our present troubles are over and the country returns again to a period of steady and orderly progress, as it will in spite of politics and parties, I hope we may look back on these days as a demonstration of the stability of our institutions. Though we may be forgetful of it today, our country has developed under the aegis of the Constitution, and by the operation of the two-party system of national control, whereby responsibility for the operation of the Government is placed on a party rather than on a group. This is no time to digress into a study of parliamentary procedure. There may be advantages in the European system of cabinet representation in parliament where the policies of the government are subject to daily test, and if the responsible ministry fails of support on a test vote, the ministry falls and another one must be set up. Since we have provided by our Constitution for the separation of the executive and the legislative branches and a definite term of office for all our national elective officers, whether executive or legislative, to preserve our governmental system we must perforce look to the record of the party represented by the administration in power and let the people decide from the record whether or not to allow that party to remain in control.

For a number of years there has been great danger that the lack of distinct lines of political cleavage between the parties would tend to break them down. Up until recently even those high up in party councils would have had difficulty in stating wherein the Republican Party and the Democratic Party differed on principle. The tariff has been, of course, theoretically a party question for many years, but we all know that it has been in its essence a local economic question. The Democrats have given tariff reduction lip service, but have showed conclusively that they did not expect to do anything about it. Prohibition, may heaven rest its soul, cut across all parties. Until recently resurrected, currency questions have been dead since the time of Bryan. As between the parties there has been no great issue to challenge the apathetic citizen.

You and I know that the balance of power between the great parties is swung by the great mass of voters who have no fixed party allegiance, and are therefore inclined, unless fundamental issues are presented in a clear-cut way, to vote largely from the point of view of the economic situation in the country. The Republican Party was in power for many years during a time of prosperity. Even though its principles may not have been very distinct in outline to the average voter, there was no particular reason for a change of government. The Republican Party contained to a great extent the political, economic, and financial leaders of the country, and it required some great change in the economic status to shake the confidence of the independent voter. When the period of trade dislocation caused by the Great War finally brought the long-delayed depression, the great mass of the independent voters swung to the Democratic ticket without any particular reason except a blind desire to register their discouragement over the existing situation. There was no deep study of principles. The temper of the people was such that platforms, campaign promises, or principles meant little. They forgot the years of peace, prosperity, and progress, but remembered only a few months of disaster. As they had been content to credit the party in power for good times, they blamed it unthinkingly for the bad. It is safe to say that no matter what principles had been enunciated by the respective candidates, in the last Presidential campaign, the result, with slight variations, would have been the same. The people wanted a change and they got it with a vengeance.

The situation today is greatly altered, and is altering more rapidly every day. The President has been in office considerably more than a year, and has had during this time a House of Representatives with a majority of almost 3 to 1, and a Senate with a majority of more than 3 to 2 of his own political faith. It is therefore right and fair to judge the Democratic Party by the record of the administration. This record shows that for the first time in many years there are fundamental issues at stake on which the parties must take the field in battle array. Our party has an opportunity unequaled in recent years to obtain the backing of the orderly, common-sense American citizen on a platform of constitutional and hereditary liberty.

I am not much interested in pointing out the discrepancies between the Democratic record since March 1933, and the principles enunciated in the Democratic platform, Mr. Roosevelt's campaign speeches, and his inaugural address, except so far as it is pertinent to point out that the voters who put Mr. Roosevelt into office certainly did not visualize what he was going to do after he was elected, for what he said he would do, and what he has done are the poles apart. What I do wish to point out, however, is that all campaign promises have been jettisoned, and the administration has charted out a course, which carried to its logical conclusion will ultimately change fundamentally the principles of government laid down by our forefathers and found by their descendants to be worthy over a period of 150 years. The time has come for the Republican Party to take up the gage of battle and bring this great issue home squarely to the country. If with full knowledge of the situation the people of the country wish to continue such a course, so be it, but it is the duty of those of us who see the danger to warn of it in no uncertain terms. If this is done properly, I have little fear of the outcome.

I am convinced that the great thinking mass of the American people believes basically in the competitive economic system under which our country has developed so greatly. They have realized that no system is perfect, and that there are shortcomings in the competitive system—times when it must be supported and directions in which it must be curbed. They realize, however, that the experience of other countries with other systems has not tended to bring about anywhere near the wealth, comfort, peace, and happiness that ours has given us over a long period of years. Our system is based on the liberty of the individual, from which in turn arises the ability of private industry to develop and thus to give employment on a fair basis to the wage-earning group, which, after all, is far the largest and most important in any country. Any system which tends to break down that theory spells the doom of this country's greatness.

It is the profit motive which makes for thrift, for efficiency, and for the energy and foresight which result in the development of natural resources. Once place all this under a planned economy of a Tugwellian nature, and the inefficiency, wastefulness, arbitrariness, and red tape of government kill the vital spark. It is this we face today.

Please do not look on me as a blind obstructionist or objector. I have tried to lean backward in studying without partisanship the whole administration record. In the last and present sessions of Congress I have supported a number of measures which in my opinion gave hope of relief and recovery and which tended to help the individual, whether human or corporate, keep its head up and help itself. It is the sinister and insidious attempt to regiment the individual person and the individual business which has had and shall have my continued and bitter opposition as long as I have any voice in public affairs.

I could talk indefinitely along this line. I could take up each important measure passed during the last 14 months and point out how it fits into my exposition of administration trends. I could show how the two theories—one of relief the other of reform—come into direct conflict; how proper relief helps industry and how ill-considered reform tends to disrupt it. In times of business prosperity certain reforms are advantageous. In times of business depression we must avoid at all costs the upheaval of business which untried experiments bring about.

What I wish to point out particularly, however, is the steady creep of the tentacles of the governmental octupus of control; how little by little, in measure after measure, powers unheard of in the past have been given to the Executive, powers which in the nature of things he cannot exercise personally but must delegate to subordinates—subordinates in many cases who do not even have to be appointed by and with the advice of the Senate, as provided in the Constitution, but may be irresponsible individuals picked by the Executive for political considerations or otherwise. Whether we refer to the Securities Act, the stock-exchange-control measure, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, the National Recovery Administration, the control of the value of the dollar, the enormous Public Works fund, in all of these we find vast discretionary powers delegated to the Executive, which in turn will be exercised not by him but by some subordinate body or individual. It may be the Federal Trade Commission, it may be the Administrator of the National Recovery Act, it may be the head of the A.A.A., it may be the Secretary of the Treasury, it may be the Public Works Administrator. The fact remains that a bureaucrat with no responsibility to anyone except the individual who has appointed him and who is far too busy to give personal attention to the acts of his appointees, is given supreme power over matters on which depend the prosperity, happiness, almost the lives of you and me.

There is contained in all this new legislation an even greater menace to our liberties. Not only are we subjected to civil suit for damages resulting from innocent acts but most of these measures contain criminal provisions, subjecting us to fines and in many cases jail sentences for a breach not only of the specific law itself but of rules and regulations not set forth in the law, but as they may be promulgated from time to time at the whim of the bureaucrat in whose hands the administration of the law may be placed. This country has come to a pretty pass when the owner of a plot of land can be sent to jail for producing more cotton than some official in Washington says he can produce, or when the director of a small company which happens to be listed on a stock exchange can be held liable to damages for an inadvertent statement with respect to his company unless he can sustain the burden of proof that he made the statement in good faith. These are merely a few of the results of the new deal which I could elaborate indefinitely if the time only permitted.

I am not asking a return to the doctrine of laissez faire. I realize that the frailties of human nature are such that government must for many years exercise certain reasonable restraints on the unbridled development of financial and economic power. These restraints should, however, be exercised as far as possible in cooperation with private industry and private capital and with sympathy for its problems. I do not believe that happiness and prosperity will return with greater and greater governmental control or through the adoption by the Government of measures which tend to make business doubtful of the future.

I believe that basic conditions, through the operation of the inexorable laws of supply and demand, are today very much better than at the depth of the depression. I believe that the world at large, and this country particularly, are prepared for general improvement. I deeply fear that this general improvement will be greatly delayed by experimenting with the currency, by unnecessary overexpenditure, which will place a tax burden on the country which it must carry for many years, and particularly by overcentralization of government, and by Government interference and competition with business, which makes it increasingly difficult for industry to get into its stride.

There are three simple principles which I should like to see made the background of the new development of the Republican Party which is now on its way.

First. We must balance the Budget, and balance not only the regular Budget but the so-called "emergency budget." Bankruptcy of a nation is just as destructive whether it comes as a result of emergency expenditures or of regular expenditures.

Second. We must fix once and for all our currency policy. The experience of the centuries proves that a stabilized currency is the only thing which the average business man can understand and which will give him confidence. Commodity dollars may be satisfactory for the professor, but the mere fact that even the commodity-dollar professors cannot agree on the way in which they can control the value of their dollar seems to indicate that such an experiment is unsound and full of dynamite.

Third. We must get rid, as soon as possible, of our emergency governmental bodies, abolish the regimentation of industry which the present administration is developing more and more, and give it a chance to help itself. I firmly believe that if these three principles are carried at once to the American people there will result an ever-growing return to the Republican Party as the party of common sense and constitutional rights.

WHAT BUTTER SUBSTITUTES ARE MADE OF

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, the message of the distinguished President of the United States, urging the exemption from import duty or excise taxes of the 440,000,000 pounds of coconut oil from the Philippines, is full of tender sympathy for the Philippine exporter but makes only a casual reference to the dairymen who, due to the importation of this oil and its manufacture into butter substitutes, is unable to live decently, pay his taxes, and educate his worth while child. Nor does it mention the health of the American people which is jeopardized by the importation and manufacture of coconut oil into butter substitutes.

For some years, under the lash of the internationalists and the importer who were benefited by this strange performance, agriculture and particularly dairying, has been sacrificed on the altar of foreign trade. It is not called by that name but that is the real influence back of the whole situation. The fact is that in the last year 127,967,000 pounds of coconut oil valued at $6,782,000 has gone into the manufacture of butter substitutes. These substitutes have depressed the price of butter and are at the root of the present unhappy condition of the dairymen. The profits from this performance have gone either to the Philippine exporter or to the packer kings of America who have made millions of dollars from the sale of this counterfeit food.

Let us look into the source of coconut oil and consider the matter from the standpoint of the American consumer.

Coconut oil is made from copra which is dried coconut meat. A description of copra and the processing procedure appeared in Duncan's Trade Register, a grocery magazine, published at Portland, Oreg. It is as follows:

The coconuts fall from the trees, are broken open and the meat dried in heaps under the tropical suns. This is called copra.

When dry, copra looks and smells something like stable manure, or worse.

When the stuff is ready for shipment swarms of half-naked Malays load it on ships, tramping it in the hold of vessels with bare feet. An army of naked Malays sweating under the tropical heat tramping copra that is going to be made into the poor man's butter. Think of it!

When copra arrives at American oil mills it is run out of the ship with conveyors. Generally it is piled up in the open air, where it attracts millions of flies and looks exactly like piles of stable manure, and smells a "darn sight" worse.

This compost is then ground and pressed between steam-heated rollers. The raw oil is about the most rancid and evil-smelling thing in the world. Until recently it was used exclusively for soap grease. German scientists discovered ways of refining it. The process is simple.

First, the oil is heated to a very high degree. It is then placed in vats and large quantities of sodium injected. The rancidity attacks the sodium solution and is eaten away. The oil is then treated with ether, which process solidifies the oil.

And this is the stuff they advertise as the "white meat of the coconut." This is the fatty substance of the poor man's butter. This is the vile carrion the packer kings give American children.

But do not take my word for it. Go to the copra mill and see for yourselves. Watch the process from compost to coconut oil. If you can see it made and still eat it or feed it to your children, there is nothing that will turn your stomach.

Is not it about time to get away from sentimentality and think not only in terms of the American dairymen, whose condition is desperate, but also give consideration as well to the health and well-being of the growing children of America.

The health of the American people can be given a belated inning and the American dairyman, who thus far has been ruthlessly ignored and partially destroyed by the administration's policies, materially aided by the enactment of H.R. 6612, which provides that the manufacture and sale of butter substitutes shall hereafter be prohibited in America. This measure is patterned on the Canadian statute which has been in effect for more than 10 years. The enactment of this legislation would substantially increase the buying power of the 4,000,000 dairymen in America and give great impetus to national recovery.

I wish the distinguished President had presented this phase of the case more fully in his message to Congress.

REVISION OF AIR-MAIL LAWS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill S. 3170, to revise air-mail laws, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up a conference report upon the bill S. 3170, to revise the air-mail laws, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3170) to revise air mail laws, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That the act of April 29, 1930 (46 Stat. 259, 260; U.S.C., supp. VII, title 39, secs. 464, 465c, 465d, and 465f), and the sections amended thereby are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. (a) Effective July 1, 1934, the rate of postage on air mail shall be 6 cents for each ounce or fraction thereof.

"(b) When used in this act—

"(1) The term 'air mail' means mail of any class prepaid at the rate of postage prescribed in subsection (a) of this section.

"(2) The term 'person' includes an individual, partnership, association, or corporation.

"(3) The term 'pilot' includes copilot.

"SEC. 3. (a) The Postmaster General is authorized to award contracts for the transportation of air mail by airplane between such points as he may designate, and for initial periods of not exceeding 1 year, to the lowest responsible bidders tendering sufficient guaranty for faithful performance in accordance with the terms of the advertisement at fixed rates per airplane-mile: Provided, That where the Postmaster General holds that a low bidder is not responsible or qualified under this act, such bidder shall have the right to appeal to the Comptroller General who shall speedily determine the issue, and his decision shall be final: Provided further, That the base rate of pay which may be bid and accepted in awarding such contracts shall in no case exceed 33⅓ cents per airplane-mile for transporting a mail load not exceeding 300 pounds. Payment for transportation shall be at the base rate fixed in the contract for the first 300 pounds of mail or fraction thereof plus 0.1 of such base rate for each additional 100 pounds of mail or fraction thereof, computed at the end of each calendar month on the basis of the average mail load carried per mile over the route during such month, except that in no case shall payment exceed 40 cents per airplane-mile.

"(b) No contract or interest therein shall be sold, assigned, or transferred by the person to whom such contract is awarded, to any other person without the approval of the Postmaster General; and upon any such transfer without such approval, the original contract, as well as such transfer, shall at the option of the Postmaster General become null and void.

"(c) If, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, the public interest requires it, he may grant an extension of any route, for a distance not in excess of 100 miles, and only one such extension shall be granted to any one person, and the rate of pay for such extension shall not be in excess of the contract rate on that route.

"(d) The Postmaster General may designate certain routes as primary and secondary routes and shall include at least four transcontinental routes and the eastern and western coastal routes among primary routes. The character of the designation of such routes shall be published in the advertisements for bids, which bids may be asked for in whole or in part of such routes.

"(e) If on any route only one bid is received, or if the bids received appear to the Postmaster General to be excessive, he shall either reject them or submit the same to the Interstate Commerce Commission for its direction in the premises before awarding the contract.

"(f) The Postmaster General shall not award contracts for air-mail routes or extend such routes in excess of an aggregate of 29,000 miles, and shall not establish schedules for air-mail transportation on such routes and extensions in excess of an annual aggregate of 40,000,000 airplane-miles.

"(g) Authority is hereby conferred upon the Postmaster General to provide and pay for the carriage of mail by air in conformity with the terms of any contract let by him prior to the passage of this act, or which may be let pursuant to a call for competitive bids therefor issued prior to the passage of this act, and to extend any such contract for an additional period or periods not exceeding 9 months in the aggregate at a rate of compensation not exceeding that established by this act nor that provided for in the original contract: Provided, That no such contract may be so extended unless the contractor shall agree in writing to comply with all the provisions of this act during the extended period of the contract.

"SEC. 4. The Postmaster General shall cause advertisements of air-mail routes to be conspicuously posted at each such post office that is a terminus of the route named in such advertisement, for at least 20 days, and a notice thereof shall be published at least once a week for 2 consecutive weeks in some daily newspaper of general circulation published in the cities that are the termini for the route before the time of the opening of bids.

"SEC. 5. After the bids are opened, the Postmaster General may grant to a successful bidder a period of not more than 30 days from the date of award of the contract to take the steps necessary to qualify for mail services under the terms of this act: Provided, That at the time of the award the successful bidder executes an adequate bond with sufficient surety guaranteeing and assuring that, within such period, said bidder will fully qualify under the act faithfully to execute and to carry out the terms of the contract: Provided further, That, if there is a failure so to qualify, the amount designated in the bond will be forfeited and paid to the United States of America.

"SEC. 6. (a) The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed, after notice and hearing, to fix and determine by order, as soon as practicable and from time to time, the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for the transportation of air mail by airplane and the service connected therewith over each air-mail route, but not in excess of the rates provided for in this act, prescribing the method or methods by weight or space, or both, or otherwise, for ascertaining such rates of compensation, and to publish the same, which shall continue in force until changed by the said Commission after due notice and hearing.

"(b) The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed, at least once in every calendar year from the date of letting of any contract, to review the rates of compensation being paid to the holder of such contract, in order to be assured that no unreasonable profit is resulting or accruing therefrom. In determining what may constitute an unreasonable profit, the said Commission shall take into consideration all forms of gross income derived from the operation of airplanes over the route affected.

"(c) Any contract which may hereafter be let or extended pursuant to the provisions of this act, and which has been satisfactorily performed by the contractor during its initial or extended period, shall thereafter be continued in effect for an indefinite period, subject to any reduction in the rate of payment therefor, and such additional conditions and terms, as the said Commission may prescribe, which shall be consistent with the requirements of this act; but any contract so continued in effect may be terminated by the said Commission upon 60 days' notice, upon such hearing and notice thereof to interested parties as the Commission may determine to be reasonable; and may also be terminated by the contractor at its option upon 60 days' notice. On the termination of any air-mail contract, in accordance with any of the provisions of this act, the Postmaster General may let a new contract for air-mail service over the route affected, as authorized in this act.

"(d) All provisions of section 5 of the act of July 28, 1916 (39 Stat. 412; U.S.C., title 39, secs. 523 to 568, inclusive), relating to the administrative methods and procedure for the adjustment of rates for carriage of mail by railroads shall be applicable to the ascertainment of rates for the transportation of air mail by airplane under this act so far as consistent with the provisions of this act. For the purposes of this section the said Commission shall also have the same powers as the Postmaster General is authorized to exercise under section 10 of this act with respect to the keeping, examination, and auditing of books, records, and accounts of air-mail contractors, and it is authorized to employ special agents or examiners to conduct such examination or audit, who shall have power to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

"(e) In fixing and determining the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for air-mail transportation, the Commission shall give consideration to the amount of air mail so carried, the facilities supplied by the carrier, and its revenue and profits from all sources, and from a consideration of these and other material elements, shall fix and establish rates for each route which, in connection with the rates fixed by it for all other routes, shall be designed to keep the aggregate cost of the transportation of air mail on and after July 1, 1938, within the limits of the anticipated postal revenue therefrom.

"SEC. 7. (a) After December 31, 1934, it shall be unlawful for any person holding an air-mail contract to buy, acquire, hold, own, or control, directly or indirectly, any shares of stock or other interest in any other partnership, association, or corporation engaged directly or indirectly in any phase of the aviation industry, whether so engaged through air transportation of passengers, express, or mail, through the holding of an air-mail contract, or through the manufacture or sale of airplanes, airplane parts, or other materials or accessories generally used in air transportation, and regardless of whether such buying, acquisition, holding, ownership, or control is done directly, or is accomplished indirectly, through an agent, subsidiary, associate, affiliate, or by any other device whatsoever: Provided, That the prohibitions herein contained shall not extend to interests in landing fields, hangars, or other ground facilities necessarily incidental to the performance of the transportation service of such air-mail contractor, nor to shares of stock in corporations whose principal business is the maintenance or operation of such landing fields, hangars, or other ground facilities.

"(b) After December 31, 1934, it shall be unlawful (1) for any partnership, association, or corporation, the principal business of which, in purpose or in fact, is the holding of stock in other corporations, or (2) for any partnership, association, or corporation engaged directly or indirectly in any phase of the aviation industry, as specified in subsection (a) of this section, to buy, acquire, hold, own, or control, directly or indirectly, either as specified in such subsection (a) or otherwise, any shares of stock or other interests in any other partnership, association, or corporation which holds an air-mail contract.

"(c) No person shall be qualified to enter upon the performance of an air-mail contract, or thereafter to hold an air-mail contract, if at or after the time specified for the commencement of mail transportation under such contract, such person is (or, if a partnership, association, or corporation, has and retains a member, officer, or director that is) a member, officer, director, or stockholder in any other partnership, association, or corporation, whose principal business, in purpose or in fact, is the holding of stock in other corporations, or which is engaged in any phase of the aviation industry, as specified in subsection (a) of this section.

"(d) No person shall be qualified to enter upon the performance of, or thereafter to hold an air-mail contract, (1) if at or after the time specified for the commencement of mail transportation under such contract, such person is (or, if a partnership, association, or corporation, has a member, officer, or director, or an employee performing general managerial duties, that is) an individual who has theretofore entered into any unlawful combination to prevent the making of any bids for carrying the mails: Provided, That whenever required by the Postmaster General the bidder shall submit an affidavit executed by the bidder, or by such of its officers, directors, or general managerial employees as the Postmaster General may designate, sworn to before an officer authorized and empowered to administer oaths, stating in such affidavit that the affiant has not entered nor proposed to enter into any combination to prevent the making of any bid for carrying the mails, nor made any agreement, or given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person to bid or not to bid for any mail contract, or (2) if it pays any officer, director, or regular employee compensation in any form, whether as salary, bonus, commission, or otherwise, at a rate exceeding $17,500 per year for full time.

"SEC. 8. Any company alleging to hold a claim against the Government on account of any mail contract that may have heretofore been annulled, may prosecute such claim as it may have against the United States for the cancelation of such contract in the Court of Claims of the United States, provided that such suit be brought within 1 year from the date of the passage of this act; and any person not ineligible under the terms of this act who qualifies under the other requirements of this act, shall be eligible to contract for carrying air mail, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3950 of the Revised Statutes (act of June 8, 1872).

"SEC. 9. Each person desiring to bid on an air-mail contract shall be required to furnish in its bid a list of all the stockholders holding more than 5 percent of its entire capital stock, and of its directors, and a statement covering the financial set-up, including a list of assets and liabilities; and in the case of a corporation, the original amount paid to such corporation for its stock, and whether paid in cash, and if not paid in cash, a statement for what such stock was issued. Such information and the financial responsibility of such bidder, as well as the bond offered, may be taken into consideration by the Postmaster General in determining the qualifications of the bidder.

"SEC. 10. All persons holding air-mail contracts shall be required to keep their books, records, and accounts under such regulations as may be promulgated by the Postmaster General, and he is hereby authorized to examine and audit the books, records, and accounts of such contractors and to require a full financial report under such regulations as he may prescribe.

"SEC. 11. Before the establishment and maintenance of an air-mail route the Postmaster General shall notify the Secretary of Commerce, who thereupon shall certify to the Postmaster General the character of equipment to be employed and maintained on each air-mail route. In making this determination the Secretary of Commerce, in his specifications furnished to the Postmaster General, shall determine only the speed, load capacity, and safety features and safety devices on airplanes to be used on the route, which said specifications shall be included in the advertisement for bids.

"SEC. 12. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to prescribe the maximum flying hours of pilots on air-mail lines, and safe operation methods on such lines, and is further authorized to approve agreements between air-mail operating companies and their pilots and mechanics for retirement benefits to such pilots and mechanics. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to prescribe all necessary regulations to carry out the provisions of this section and section 11 of this act.

"SEC. 13. It shall be a condition upon the awarding or extending and the holding of any air-mail contract that the rate of compensation and the working conditions and relations for all pilots, mechanics, and laborers employed by the holder of such contract shall conform to decisions of the National Labor Board. This section shall not be construed as restricting the right of collective bargaining on the part of any such employees.

"SEC. 14. The Federal Radio Commission shall give equal facilities in the allocation of radio frequencies in the aeronautical band to those airplanes carrying mail and/or passengers during the time the contract is in effect.

"SEC. 15. After October 1, 1934, no air-mail contractor shall hold more than three contracts for carrying air mail, and in case of the contractor of any primary route, no contract for any other primary route shall be awarded to or extended for such contractor. It shall be unlawful for air-mail contractors, competing in parallel routes, to merge or to enter into any agreement, express or implied, which may result in common control or ownership.

"SEC. 16. The Postmaster General may provide service to Canada within 150 miles of the international boundary line, over domestic routes which are now or may hereafter be established and may authorize the carrying of either foreign or domestic mail, or both, to and from any points on such routes and make payment for services over such routes out of the appropriation for the domestic Air Service: Provided, That this section shall not be construed as repealing the authority given by the act of March 2, 1929 (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 39, sec. 465a).

"SEC. 17. The Postmaster General may cause any contract to be canceled for willful disregard of or willful failure by the contractor to comply with the terms of its contract or the provisions of law herein contained and for any conspiracy or acts designed to defraud the United States with respect to such contracts. This provision is cumulative to other remedies now provided by law.

"SEC. 18. Whoever shall enter into any combination, understanding, agreement, or arrangement to prevent the making of any bid for any contract under this act, to induce any other person not to bid for any such contract, or to deprive the United States Government in any way of the benefit of full and free competition in the awarding of any such contract, shall, upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.

"SEC. 19. If any person shall willfully or knowingly violate any provision of this act his contract, if one shall have been awarded to him, shall be forfeited, and such person shall upon conviction be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than 5 years.

"SEC. 20. The President is hereby authorized to appoint a commission composed of five members to be appointed by him, not more than three members to be appointed from any one political party, for the purpose of making an immediate study and survey, and to report to Congress not later than February 1, 1935, its recommendations of a broad policy covering all phases of aviation and the relation of the United States thereto. Members appointed who are not already in the service of the United States shall receive compensation of not exceeding the rate of compensation of a Senator or Representative in Congress.

"SEC. 21. Such commission shall organize by electing one of its members as chairman, and it shall appoint a secretary whose salary shall not exceed the rate of $5,000 per annum. Said commission shall have the power to pay actual expenses of members of the commission in the performance of their duties, to employ counsel, experts, and clerks, to subpena witnesses, to require the production by witnesses of papers and documents pertaining to such matters as are within the jurisdiction of the commission, to administer oaths, and to take testimony, and for such purpose there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $75,000.

And the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the title proposed to be inserted by the House amendment, insert the following: "An act to revise air mail laws, and to establish a commission to make a report to the Congress recommending an aviation policy."

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. 3170) to revise air-mail laws, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House amendment struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause. The Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, with an amendment which is a substitute for both the Senate bill and the House amendment. The differences between the Senate bill and the substitute agreed upon by the conferees are noted in the following discussion, except for incidental changes made necessary to harmonize various provisions affected by the agreements reached.

Section 1 of the Senate bill repealed the act of April 29, 1930, and the sections of the Air Mail Act amended thereby. The House amendment in section 16 repealed laws in conflict with the provisions of the House amendment. The conference agreement retains the Senate provisions.

RATE OF AIR-MAIL POSTAGE

Section 22 of the Senate bill amended section 3 of the Air Mail Act to fix the postage rate on air mail at 6 cents per ounce or fraction thereof. The House amendment in section 2 fixed the rate of postage at 5 cents, effective July 1, 1934. The conference agreement retains the provisions of section 2 of the House amendment (which also includes definitions of "air mail" and "pilot", in addition to a definition of "person" similar to that in section 2 of the Senate bill) except that the rate of postage is fixed at 6 cents.

CONTRACTS FOR CARRYING AIR MAIL

Section 3 of the Senate bill provided for (1) the awarding of contracts to carry air mail for periods not exceeding 1 year, with payment at the rate of 30 cents per airplane-mile for a mail load not exceeding 300 pounds, plus one-tenth of such rate for each additional 100 pounds of mail carried, subject to a maximum payment of 40 cents per airplane-mile; (2) granting of not to exceed one extension for any route for a distance not exceeding 100 miles; (3) designating of routes as primary and secondary routes, with at least four transcontinental routes to be included as primary routes; (4) authorizing bidders to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission from a denial of an award by the Postmaster General; and (5) prohibiting transfer of contracts except with approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Postmaster General. The House amendment, in section 3 thereof, (1) fixed the rate at 35 cents instead of 30 cents; (2) authorized appeal from the Postmaster General in the manner provided by law; (3) authorized the extension of temporary contracts awarded under competitive bidding for additional periods not exceeding 9 months; (4) prohibited transfer of contracts except with the approval of the Postmaster General; and (5) limited air-mail routes to an aggregate of 29,000 miles and air-mail schedules to an annual aggregate of 40,000,000 airplane-miles.

The conference agreement (1) fixes the rate of payment at 33⅓ cents per airplane-mile subject to the maximum of 40 cents per airplane-mile, (2) provides for appeal by bidders to the Comptroller General, (3) retains the provision of the House amendment on limitation of route mileage and aggregate airplane mileage, (4) retains the provisions of the House amendment authorizing the extension of existing emergency contracts, making such contracts subject to the provisions of the act, (5) provides that all of the transcontinental routes and the eastern and western coastal routes shall be designated as primary routes, and (6) prohibits transfer of contracts except with the approval of the Postmaster General.

Section 4 of the Senate bill provided for posting of advertisement of air-mail routes for 30 days, and publication of a notice in a daily newspaper for 4 weeks before opening the bids. The House amendment required posting for 15 days and publication of the notice once in a daily newspaper. The conference agreement requires posting for 20 days and publication of notice thereof once a week for 2 weeks.

Section 5 of the Senate bill allowed a successful bidder a period of 3 months from the date of the award to qualify for carrying air mail. The House amendment contained no corresponding provision, and the conference agreement retains the Senate provision except that the 3 months' period is reduced to 30 days.

FIXING OF RATES BY INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

Section 6 of the Senate bill (1) authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix and determine the public convenience and necessity for all air transportation routes and the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for the transportation of mail matter by airplane common carriers, (2) authorized the extension of emergency air-mail contracts for not to exceed 9 months at the rates fixed in the contracts, (3) made the provisions of the Railway Mail Service Pay Act of July 28, 1916 (relating to the rates for carriage of mail by railroad), applicable to the adjustment of rates for carrying air mail by airplane, and (4) prohibited the inclusion of any subsidy by way of compensation for carrying air mail. The House amendment contained no corresponding provisions, except as to extension of emergency contracts (sec. 3).

The conference agreement provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall (1) fix and determine as soon as practicable the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for carrying air mail by airplane, (2) take into consideration in determining rates various elements relating to air-mail operations, (3) fix the rates so as to keep the aggregate cost of air-mail transportation on and after July 1, 1938, within the limits of the anticipated postal revenue from air mail, and (4) review annually the rates to determine that no unreasonable profit is accruing from air-mail operations. The conference agreement further provides for the indefinite extension of air-mail contracts let under the act, if satisfactorily performed, subject to any reduction in the rate of payment pursuant to the rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

RELATIONS OF AIR-MAIL CONTRACTORS WITH HOLDING COMPANIES, AVIATION MANUFACTURING COMPANIES, AND OTHER AIR-MAIL CONTRACTORS

Section 7 of the Senate bill prescribed requirements relating to holding-company control, relations with aviation manufacturing companies, interlocking directorates and other intercorporate relationships, and salaries of officers of air-mail contracting companies. The House amendment had no similar provisions. The conference agreement in general retains the provisions of the Senate bill with some rearrangement of language for greater clarity, postponing the effective date of the requirements until January 1, 1935.

Section 8 of the Senate bill relating to eligibility of bidders for air-mail contracts and cancelations of air-mail contracts under section 3950 of the Revised Statutes corresponded substantially with section 5 of the House amendment, and the language of the Senate bill is retained.

Section 9 of the Senate bill required the furnishing of lists of stockholders and a financial statement in connection with bids for air-mail contracts. The House amendment contained no similar provision, and the conference agreement retains the Senate section.

Section 10 of the Senate bill relating to the keeping of accounts by air-mail contractors is the same as section 6 of the House amendment and is retained without change.

Section 11 of the Senate bill relating to equipment to be used by air-mail contractors is the same as section 7 of the House amendment and is retained without change.

Section 12 of the Senate bill authorized the Secretary of Commerce to prescribe maximum flying hours of pilots, safe operation methods, and to initiate and approve agreements for retirement benefits for pilots and mechanics. The corresponding section 8 of the House amendment did not have the provision relating to retirement benefits. The conference agreement authorizes the Secretary of Commerce to approve (but not to initiate) agreements relating to retirement benefits for pilots and mechanics.

Section 13 of the Senate bill relating to rate of compensation of pilots, mechanics, and laborers corresponds to section 9 of the House amendment, and is retained except for modifications of language to take care of the extensions of contracts provided for in previous sections and to recognize the fact that the National Labor Board has already rendered decisions on rates of compensation, working conditions, and relations of pilots, mechanics, and laborers, which have modified those in force in 1933.

Sections 14, 15, and 16 of the Senate bill contained provisions relating to transfer and training of personnel of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps with respect to the commercial air-mail service. The House bill contained no corresponding provisions, and the conference agreement omits any such provisions.

Section 17 of the Senate bill provided for the allocation of equal radio facilities to airplanes. The corresponding section 10 of the House amendment limited the allocation to radio frequencies in the aeronautical band, and the conference agreement (sec. 14) accepts this House amendment.

MERGER OF CONTRACTORS

Section 18 of the Senate bill contained provisions relating to the merger of air-mail contractors and the holding of more than one contract by an air-mail contractor. The House amendment contained no corresponding provision. The conference agreement (sec. 15) provides that no air-mail contractor shall hold more than three contracts for carrying air mail and that the contractor of a primary route shall not be allowed to hold a contract for any other primary route. The conference agreement (sec. 15) retains the Senate provision against the merging of air-mail contractors competing in parallel routes.

Section 19 of the Senate bill reenacted section 8 of the Air Mail Act of 1925, and this provision is retained in the conference agreement (sec. 16).

PENAL PROVISIONS

Sections 20, 21, and 23 of the Senate bill contained the penal provisions and correspond to sections 12, 13, and 14 of the House amendment. The conference agreement (secs. 17, 18, and 19) modified (1) section 20 to provide for cancelation of contracts for failure to comply with the terms of the contract as provided in section 12 of the House amendment; (2) retains section 13 of the House amendment, which contained a provision making it unlawful to deprive the United States of the benefit of full and free competition; and (3) retains, without change, section 23 of the Senate bill, which is the same as section 14 of the House amendments.

COMMISSION ON AVIATION POLICY

Sections 24 and 25 of the Senate bill provided for an aviation policy commission composed of seven members, with a secretary at a salary of $7,500 per annum and with an authorization for expenses of $100,000. The House amendment in sections 17 and 18 provided for a commission of five members to report to Congress not later than February 1, 1935, and to have a secretary at a salary of $5,000 per annum, and with an authorization of expenses of $75,000. The conference agreement (secs. 20 and 21) retains the provisions of the House amendment.

JAS. M. MEAD,
M. A. ROMJUE,
D. C. DOBBINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this conference report, which is the result of efforts to straighten out the present confused air-mail situation, in my estimation, will make the chaos complete. The last 90 days have witnessed a number of strange situations, but this measure will put the capsheaf on the chaotic situation which has existed during that time.

The House committee brought in a bill which was frankly a temporary measure. It had two features. One provided for the temporary contracts; the second was a commission to make a study and report to the next Congress. That at least was a logical plan and could have been operated had it not been for the fact that the Post Office Department prior to that time had awarded contracts under the old, superseded wagon route law of 1872, and had announced that they proposed to let all contracts on that basis. Therefore, when the House committee brought in its bill it was a temporary bill which was nullified by the action of the Post Office Department.

That bill went to conference and we met there a bill which had a permanent plan for air mail. This conference report is the alleged permanent policy for the future of air mail.

In my estimation, it is so temporary that everybody concerned will be pleading for its repeal at the earliest moment possible in the next Congress.

This measure provided in the conference report is built upon two exactly opposite principles. It is a conflict of incompatibles. In the first place, it puts its faith in unrestricted competitive bidding. In the first section of the bill it has a plan laid out as follows:

> The Postmaster General is authorized to award contracts for the transportation of air mail by airplane between such points as he may designate, and for initial periods of not exceeding 1 year, to the lowest responsible bidders tendering sufficient guaranty for faithful performance in accordance with the terms of the advertisement.

Now, that is at least a plan whereby the lowest responsible bidder can come in and take contracts, but it is not the intention to let contracts under that provision. Contracts have already been let and are being let on a 90-day provision under the act of 1872. It is not the intention to use these 1-year contracts at all. Such action might be logically defended, although I oppose it. That is, on the basis of unrestricted competitive bidding, companies could come in and take the contracts. That is completely nulified in this bill by the restrictions which are laid down upon bidders and upon the awarding of a contract. For instance, primary routes are laid out in this bill as transcontinental and eastern and western coast lines. Those are called primary routes, and by the terms of this bill, as now written, no company shall have more than one of those routes. At the present time, under the bids which have been let and awarded by the Post Office Department, United Airways holds a contract for the transcontinental, from New York to San Francisco. They also hold, as the lowest bidders, a contract between Seattle and San Diego. Under the provisions of this bill one of those routes must be canceled. Now these operators have come in; they have been bidding; they have been declared responsible, and they have legal contracts, yet under the terms of this bill they must be deprived of either the transcontinental or the west coast line. That is one restriction which completely nullifies the open competitive-bidding plan.

There is another. Under this bill, as written, no company shall have more than three contracts. At the present time American Airways has been granted two contracts as the lowest responsible bidders. On Friday the Department opened bids on other contracts, and the American Airways came in as the low bidder on five of them. Under the terms of the conference report bill, it is impossible to grant them to the lowest responsible bidders. They can only have three contracts. Therefore there must be a cancelation and new contracts must be ordered.

Mr. DOBBINS. Will the gentleman yield as to the statement just now made?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. DOBBINS. The bill recommended by the conference report provides that that shall not be in effect after October 1, 1934, and will permit these 3-month contracts let to be carried out.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes; but that makes it worse. After 3 months' operation they must give way to a new company. This is a permanent policy bill and the provisions written into it are supposed to be for permanent legislation. There must be cancelation of some of these contracts in order to bring them within three, which is the limit in this bill.

Now, this bill also lays down requirements which are unknown and uncertain, and which apply after an award has been made. For instance, there is a very worthy provision in any air mail law. That is, all contractors must abide by the decision of the Labor Board as to wages and working conditions. The bidders bid under no such consideration, and they are in a position to say the advertising for bids was unfair and the award was made on a different basis.

Then there is the provision that the equipment requirements may be laid down by the Secretary of Commerce. That is another restriction on the principle of the lowest responsible bidder's getting the award. They are good requirements but they cannot be squared with the fundamental principle of this bill. In my opinion, it will be impossible to operate this measure as it is provided, and there will be a cancelation of contracts and continual confusion. There will be opening of new bids. There will be varying interpretations. It will bring uncertainty and chaos into the situation, and there is no solution in this measure.

Further, this bill provides that these 90-day contracts may be extended from time to time up to an aggregate of 9 months.

At the end of these extensions, however, it is provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission may take over the contracts, give them an indefinite franchise, and fix the rates of payment. One section of the report would indicate that the Commission might make a fair rate for the carriage of air mail by airplane; but that is not the real intent. The Interstate Commerce Commission is given authority only to reduce the rates under the contract bid. They cannot fix a fair rate which will cover the actual carriage of the air mail. They are held down to the contract bid for all time.

Last Friday American Airways put in a bid of 8 cents a mile from Chicago to Fort Worth. At the same time they put in a bid of 43½ cents a mile for another line. There is no justification for such a variance in bids. If the low bid is fair, the high bid is outrageously unfair. If the lowest bid of 8 cents a mile is unfairly low, then the Interstate Commerce Commission is forever precluded from going above 8 cents but can only bring the rate down. The 39½-cent rate can be shaded down little by little, leaving a great margin between rates paid.

I wish the entire membership of the House knew these bids which were made as the result of advertising under the law of 1872. It is the most striking thing which can be imagined. For instance, the United was awarded the contract between New York and San Francisco at a rate of 38 cents an airplane-mile. The other transcontinental line, T.W.A., on a route between New York and Los Angeles, was awarded the contract at 24 cents a mile. Between these two bids is a range of 14 cents a mile for service under exactly similar conditions. A still more striking example is the bid of the American Air Lines, known as the "Cord Co." It was given a contract on bids made under the law of 1872 between Fort Worth and Los Angeles at a rate of 39½ cents a mile.

On Friday this company bid on the route between New York and Fort Worth, the other leg of a transcontinental route, at 13 cents a mile. Now, if they are granted this contract as the lowest bidder, then mail going from New York to Fort Worth will be paid for at the rate of 13 cents a mile and will be picked up at Fort Worth and carried to Los Angeles at 39 cents a mile, an astounding situation that should never exist under any legislation. By dividing this transcontinental route in two, the company can hold three contracts instead of one. If the Department says that this is a transcontinental line and combines the two, making the route New York to Los Angeles by way of Fort Worth, then there must be a cancelation of these two contracts and bids again submitted under entirely new conditions. Those things mean that there is chaos and uncertainty built into this entire bill. It is impossible to believe that the situation can continue where there is a difference in bids from 8 cents to 39½ cents. Sooner or later some attempt must be made to get a fair rate for the actual carriage of the mail. I do not believe a single Member of this House would contend that this measure is a solution of the air-mail situation. It is a desperate attempt to meet a series of emergencies resulting from the cancelation of all contracts on February 9. I know the Post Office Committee of this House could write a measure which would provide a fundamental solution, and was ready to do it at the time of the cancelation of the contracts.

This measure, as now written, will have to be repealed or completely modified as soon as the next Congress meets. Not only that, but during the ensuing 6 months there will be continual rearrangements, cancelation, and complaints. The operation under interstate-commerce control will be confusion worse confounded. I believe we should have undertaken to write permanent air-mail legislation. We had a bill before the House committee which was the result of a year's study. The basis of pay was not the airplane-mile basis as used in this bill. Under the pending bill there is no relationship between the amount of mail carried and the payment up to 300 pounds. In other words, the limitation here of 33⅓ cents per mile is based on loads up to 300 pounds, but it is possible to have payment for a 10-pound load up to the entire amount of this rate.

The Postmaster General has been declaring that the result of all this medley has been a greatly decreased cost of carrying the air mail. It has been declared that we will save $10,000,000 a year under the low bids that are now being received. Mr. Speaker, this is a fallacy. We have now a spider web over this country without proper regard to where the mail volume really is. We have a spider web on a one-round-trip-a-day basis. Under this system, figuring on the lowest bids received, counting the 8-cent bid and all the rest, the total cost will run between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000. In order to give the country air-mail service such as it was receiving before February 9, it will be necessary to double these schedules, and by doubling them there will be a doubled cost. So before we say there has been any $10,000,000 saving we shall have to figure the service that must be given. The only way to get air mail on a basis which provides a permanent solution is through the pound-mile basis instead of the airplane-mile basis, so that on every pound of mail carried 1 mile a fixed rate would be established. This can be done to come within the revenues being received.

I have not time to call attention to all the inconsistencies in this bill. One of them provides that no bidder shall bid unless he files with his bid a list of his stockholders, his directors, and his assets and liabilities. Another provision of the bill provides that a bidder may have 30 days to organize a company and qualify after the award of the contract has been made.

In other words, a bidder without any assets can be awarded a contract, and with that contract in his pocket he can go out and sell stock, arrange his board of directors, and establish his assets.

Contradictions in this bill are numerous, and operation will prove their impossibility. However, the fundamental thing that is wrong is the attempt to put a competitive, unrestrictive price-bid plan in effect with all kinds of restrictions which completely nullify that principle. If I had the power I would make these airplane companies common carriers as are the railroads. I would lay down an established rate per pound-mile for the carriage of mail by aircraft and provide that after a fixed date the total pay should not exceed the amount of revenues received. That would be a fundamental policy, and sooner or later we must adopt it.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BACON. What is the necessity for this legislation at all if the Postmaster General is proceeding under the act of 1872?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. There is no necessity for it at this time, because they can extend those routes for 9 months.

Mr. BACON. Would it not be better to wait until the next Congress and then have a real investigation so that a permanent policy could be worked out?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is the only sensible thing to do under the conditions as they now exist. We have to face the fact that they are going to continue for 9 months under the old law unless they are declared invalid in the courts. There is a commission to be appointed under this bill, with an appropriation of $75,000 for them to make a study of the situation. This commission is to report by February 1935. In the same measure we are setting up permanent provisions while we are spending this $75,000 for a commission to report recommendations as to permanent policy.

This is an absurd situation, and it seems to me it might be well to allow the matter to rest in the hands of the Department with the power to make 9-month contracts by extensions and then have the commission report permanent recommendations. Under such circumstances we might then have a final solution. Under this measure there will be many complications, and it will be impossible for the public to know what air-mail service can be extended to them.

It is an absurdity to attempt to write a permanent bill on a temporary framework. It is an absurdity to set up unrestricted competition and, at the same time, handicap bidders with restrictions that were not taken into consideration at the time of bidding. While I take it for granted the measure will be passed, I simply want to say that the operation of it will be the culmination of the air-mail chaos. It will prove impracticable, and it will only make more certain the necessity of the Congress itself writing a fundamental air-mail bill for the benefit of the public and the Postal Service. The sooner we do that the better it will be for all concerned.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. I notice on page 2 of the conference report these words, "and the eastern and western coastal routes." In the bill which passed the House these words were not included?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. They were not.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Can the gentleman tell me what brought about the declaration that the eastern and western coastal routes were among the primary routes?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It was declared that the east and west coastal lines were transcontinental lines and should be put in that classification.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. At the opening of bids recently the United Air Lines was successful in bidding on the route from New York to San Francisco and also one on the west coast. If this bill passes, it will penalize the United Air Lines, and they will have to give up one of those routes?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes. That is just one of the features in the measure. United has already been awarded the contract, and here is a cancelation enforced by the terms of this bill which we are passing now.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. It seems to me this was put in to favor some line that had not been a successful bidder.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimouse consent to extend my remarks by including the bids received in the recent letting by the Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am appending herewith the result of the bidding for air-mail contracts under the 1872 law, with the successful companies shown.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DOBBINS].

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has so emphatically denounced this conference report, has well described our conference and the proceedings leading up to the passage of this legislation as a conflict of incompatibles. The incompatibility in this conflict has resulted from the widely divergent views of those who desire the air mail to be carried over the country at the most reasonable rate which the Government can obtain, and of those who would create a monopolistic rate and would perpetuate the old carriers in their monopoly.

On the first day of the special session of this Congress, in March of last year, there was introduced in this House a bill which represents one school of thought in this conflict of incompatibility. It is H.R. 3, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. May I call the attention of the House to the purpose expressed in that bill as to the manner in which air-mail contracts should be let?

In section 4 appears this language:

Provided, further, That no mail shall be dispatched on planes operated by any individual, firm, or corporation whose planes were not carrying air mail on January 1, 1933, except as hereinafter provided.

Think of that language. It would permit none to carry the air mail of this country unless it is one of the favored contractors who had received one of the contracts awarded by the former Postmaster General, Mr. Brown.

True, there is an exception, but the exception is a very minor one and appears in section 7 of the bill H.R. 3, where provisions for extension of existing service are set forth. Then others might come in and get a contract, but only in the case of new or additional routes, which would not duplicate service already in existence and performed by what the bill calls a "regular operator." And no one could get one of these comparatively rare new contracts, under that bill, unless he had maintained a daily scheduled air transportation service over a route not less than 250 miles in length for a period of 6 months.

Referring to this legislation, which would continue upon improved terms, the very reasonable contracts now being started, the gentleman calls it chaos. If this be chaos, we had better have more of it. Under the contracts that have just been let, and assuming the lowest bidders in these recent lettings will receive the contracts now in process of formation, the cost of the air-mail service for this country, with over 3,000 miles of additional routes and reaching every State of the Union, which we did not do before this, and supplying 20 cities never served before, will amount to less than 40 percent of what it was 2 years ago, when Mr. Brown was in office. We shall see an annual saving of nearly $12,000,000.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOBBINS. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] to make the statement that the quantity of service on these different lines and to these different stations had been materially reduced and that this reduction in cost was due to the reduction in quantity of service. Is the gentleman prepared to give us some information on that point?

Mr. DOBBINS. The aggregate trip mileage of the routes flown in 1932 was about 34,500,000 miles. Under the schedules now provided it runs something over 28,500,000 miles. So an increase of considerably less than 25 percent would provide more schedules than we had before with an increase of about 20 percent in the cost, and this would run us up to about $9,000,000 annually, whereas the cost was just about $20,000,000 before.

Mr. HARLAN. If the gentleman will permit another question, the matter I am interested in is this: Under the old schedule a certain number of deliveries were made, say, in Washington in a day. Is the number of deliveries being reduced under the new bill?

Mr. DOBBINS. By an increase of less than 25 percent in the number of airplane miles or schedules now provided for, we can furnish more service than we had before, but it is the feeling of the Post Office Department that we had an unnecessary number of schedules before; that schedules were sometimes provided where they were not needed, and this resulted in unwarranted payments of additional compensation to the carriers.

Competition in this matter has produced, it is true, some rates which are not in harmony. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] pointed out, over one route there is a bid of 13 cents a mile for one part of the route and a bid of about twice as much for the remainder of the route. This law, however, provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall supervise these rates and will harmonize them, and when they have done that, the rates will have to be reduced down to whatever the Interstate Commerce Commission finds to be reasonable or the contract will be terminated.

The bill, as it has been agreed to in conference, ratifies and confirms the contracts now being let by the Post Office Department and provides for their extension, but in permitting such extension it is further provided they cannot be extended for more than they were originally bid for nor for more than this act provides as a top limit.

This answers completely the contention that these contractors are bidding a ridiculously low rate so as to perpetuate themselves in a contract and, later, will have their rate of pay increased. That simply cannot be done. If they are not satisfied with the rate they have bid or if they are not satisfied with the limitation which this bill puts upon the contract, the only alternative is to call for new competitive bids.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary, in order to protect these corporations against their own folly, that we guarantee them a rate more than that for which they say they can carry this mail and carry it at a profit. By their own admissions in these competitive biddings, they have shown they can carry the mail for less than half what it was carried for before and make a profit, and I do not think it is necessary for Congress to constitute itself a conservator for the airlines to see that they are paid twice as much as they think they should have upon the absurd pretext that they may otherwise not ruin themselves in the undertaking.

This act recommended by the conference provides that no holder of a primary route may have a contract on another primary route, and it provides that the eastern and western coastal lines shall be primary routes.

There is a good reason back of this provision. Four transcontinental routes terminating at different points on the Pacific coast are primary routes. If the holder of any one of these routes should be allowed to have a connecting link across the termini of the four great transcontinental airlines on the Pacific coast or on the Atlantic coast, it would be quite possible for that one concern so to arrange its passenger schedules as to divert an undue proportion of the transcontinental-air-passenger traffic to the particular trunk route being operated by the company having the coastal-route contract. Therefore it is provided in this bill that no two of these contracts shall be held by the same person.

The pound-mile rate of pay is advocated by the opposition as the only ideal way of compensating air-mail carriers for the transportation of the mails. If that idea should be carried into effect, it would mean that any operator in any part of the country must be paid the same rate per pound of air mail carried as any other operator in any other part of the country; and it is well known, as the regulations established by the former Postmaster General recognize, that there are varying conditions throughout the country which make it more expensive to carry mail through the air in some parts of the country than in others. Some ships must fly over mountains, while others have nothing but plains to traverse, with an emergency landing field furnished by every field or pasture beneath them, whereas those going over the Rocky Mountains or similar terrain must frequently fly hundreds of miles before they can find an emergency landing field. Fog and snow conditions in the Northwest make it difficult and expensive to operate an air service there, whereas down in the southern part of the country the service can be operated on an uninterrupted daily schedule without any climatic handicap adding to the expense. Some lines have heavy passenger traffic, which enables them to support their overhead costs without requiring much help from air-mail revenues, while on other lines there is practically nothing to be transported except the mails.

The directions to the Interstate Commerce Commission provided for in this bill are that all of such elements shall be taken into consideration by the Interstate Commerce Commission in establishing what are fair rates in this bill. That, Mr. Speaker, protects the United States Government and the people of the United States in the matter of rates, and this law provides for revision of rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission in only one direction—downward. Moreover, the Interstate Commerce Commission is prevented by the provisions of this act from increasing the cost of air transportation above whatever rate the contractors themselves may bid for their respective contracts, so long as the contracts are held without a new competitive letting of bids.

Therefore, the only direction that we can go under this bill is in the direction of improvement, in the direction of the best interests of the people, and that is what we are going to do.

This new air mail act has been most carefully studied by the conferees. It does not represent solely the views of the House, neither does it represent the individual views of the Senate, but it constitutes a very fair and reasonable compromise between the views of both bodies; and I am satisfied that experience will demonstrate that it is an excellent law. [Applause.]

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DOCKWEILER].

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I agree with the House conferees and the Democratic conferees fixing the rate for carrying air mail. I do not agree with my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] in the 1 mill per pound-mile for carrying air mail.

I do believe that the method fixed by the House bill is the correct method. Now, that is purely a question that is debatable, and I think time will prove whether the Democratic conferees are correct, or whether the other side of the House is correct, because I believe that the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks more or less the sentiment on his side of the House.

Now, my only objection to this report is that I am wondering what is going to happen to the Pacific coast. I do not see the logic in preventing a contractor of a transcontinental line from taking a contract on a part or all of a north and south primary route.

Now, four great routes across the country are fixed by this bill, and two routes north and south, one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific coast. I shall speak only of the situation on the Pacific coast. We have been served by airplane service for passenger, express, and also for mail from San Diego to Seattle. The United Air Lines happens to be at this time the successful bidder and operator of the line going up and down the coast on the Pacific. It is thought by letting United Air Lines retain that primary route as a contractor and then permitting that same line to have a transcontinental primary route from the eastern coast of San Francisco that that particular company might discriminate along the coast in order to secure all of the coastal business over its primary route across the continent. I believe that is a bugaboo and that in practice will not be a real objection, because you have a primary route ending at San Diego. Whatever company has that terminus at San Diego, naturally enough will get all business generated in that area, and that business will go over that transcontinental route if that business seeks to reach the Atlantic coast or other points east. Los Angeles is the terminus of a primary transcontinental route. Whatever business is generated in that area will naturally go across the continent on the primary route whose terminus is at Los Angeles, and, so far as the business generated at San Francisco is concerned, whatever company has the terminus at San Francisco will take it east across the continent. That happens to be the United. Naturally enough they will get that business out of that area; and when you get to Seattle, Wash., and Portland, Oreg., whatever business is generated there will go east over the northern transcontinental primary route. It is not logical to believe that a man will go over the United Air Lines and leave Los Angeles and fly to San Francisco in order to get east across the continent.

That is my objection to this report. I believe the report should be voted down in order that that illogical situation may be clarified.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC].

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time to announce that today I have placed in the basket a joint resolution which has been prepared by me with the aid of the drafting committee, which would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to use the unpledged monetary stocks and the unpledged securities of the R.F.C., the Farm Credit Administration, and other Government agencies for the purpose of issuing currency, so that a sufficient amount can be issued to relieve the enormous burden that today is falling upon the Government, which causes us to pay over eight hundred million dollars a year in the way of interest on securities and bonds, many of which are untaxable. The question uppermost in the minds of many people is, How long can this Government continue at its present rate of spending? Unless something is done to solve this problem, and put an end to the issuing of tax-exempt securities, the burden of the Government will gradually grow larger. I take the position that the best policy that could be put into effect would be to print sound currency against the assets of the Government; take up and cancel as many as possible of the outstanding tax-free bonds and securities with this new issue of money, thus causing those who have invested their funds in Government securities to seek investments through normal channels which will result in a stimulation to business and at the same time reduce the Government's annual interest obligation. In other words, my proposal would cause currency to be printed and have behind it securities based upon land values and other kinds of legitimate business that have a recognized value, as well as the surplus gold and silver owned or controlled by the Government.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a copy of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

House Joint Resolution 360

Joint resolution to provide for the issue of United States notes on Government owned or pledged securities to be used to retire interest-bearing obligations of the United States and levying a tax on profits made in certain transactions

Resolved, etc.,

Whereas the question uppermost in the minds of all thinking people is how far and how long can this Government continue at the rate of speed it is now going with respect to expenditures without being confronted with a serious catastrophe; and

Whereas the United States has outstanding obligations amounting to over $25,000,000,000, which is causing the Government to expend over $800,000,000 per year in the way of interest, which is being principally paid to the holders of outstanding bonds and various kinds of short-time certificates of indebtedness; and

Whereas such bonds and certificates of indebtedness are wholly or in part exempt from taxation, which allows many individuals to invest their capital without being called upon to defray any part of the necessary expense of maintaining the Government; and

Whereas the policy of issuing tax-exempt securities can be compared to an inward malignant cancer, which is gradually consuming the capital stock in the way of values belonging to our Government, and, unless new policies can be put into effect which will change existing conditions, it is apparent to all that a small minority of beneficiaries will be able to retain control over the wealth of the Nation in a way that is certain to bring hardships to all of our citizens: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue United States notes in such form and such denominations as he deems advisable, and in amounts as authorized in section 2 (b) of this act. Such notes, to the extent of the aggregate amount thereof so authorized to be outstanding, shall be used to meet all maturing and all called obligations to repay sums borrowed by the United States, and may be used to purchase before maturity any United States' bonds and other interest-bearing obligations of the United States.

All obligations and bonds so acquired or taken up shall be retired and canceled.

SEC. 2. (a) The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is authorized and directed to assign and transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury all stock or other forms of securities, owned by the United States and held by such administration at any time after the enactment of this act, in all organizations over which such administration exercises supervisory jurisdiction. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to assign and transfer to the Secretary all collateral pledged as security for loans made by such corporation, but which has not been redeemed on the date of such enactment, and all collateral so pledged after such date. Such stock and collateral shall, together with all other stock owned by the United States and held by the Secretary in organizations over which the Farm Credit Administration exercises supervisory jurisdiction, constitute stock and collateral reserve for United States notes, but the Secretary shall withdraw from such reserve, and dispose of according to law, any such stock which is retired and collateral which is redeemed.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury—

(1) Shall issue an amount of United States notes under section 1 equal to — percent of the value, as determined by him, of the stock and collateral constituting stock and collateral reserve for United States notes, as is provided for in section 2 (a).

(2) Shall issue an amount of United States notes under section 1, in addition to the amount authorized by paragraph (1), equal to 2½ percent of the monetary value of all gold and silver owned by the United States not otherwise appropriated or obligated. As used in this section, the term "monetary value" means a value calculated on the basis of $1 for an amount of silver or gold equal to the amount at the time contained in the standard silver dollar and the gold dollar, respectively; and

(3) Shall maintain an amount of such notes outstanding as nearly as practicable at such percentages of value by issuing additional notes, or by redeeming and canceling outstanding notes, as the circumstances may require.

(c) Such gold and silver and the stock and collateral reserve for United States notes shall be held in the Treasury as security for all outstanding United States notes issued under this act until redeemed.

SEC. 3. There is hereby imposed a tax of one-fiftieth of 1 percent on all profits, including interest, derived from redeemed securities other than silver and gold which are used as a medium for the issuing of United States notes under regulations which shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 4. All provisions of law (including penalties) applicable in respect of United States notes and other currency of the United States shall, insofar as not inconsistent with this act, be applicable with respect to United States notes authorized to be issued under this act.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe such rules and regulations as he deems for the enforcement of this act.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of the time to myself. This conference report should receive the approval of the House because in my judgment its adoption will result in improved Air Mail Service. It will prevent monopoly and it will substitute competitive bidding for outright grants and extensions. It will substitute honesty and fair dealing for discrimination and favoritism. It will result in an economical service, it will save, as has been stated, from six to eight million dollars annually. It will give 4 States and 20 cities service which have never had it in the past. It will expand the Air Mail Service and free it from the damaging outgrowths of the past, it will enjoy greater opportunity to be of service in time of peace as well as in time of war.

Something has been said about the eastern and western coastal lines, and about the number of contracts allotted to any one contractor. Let this be understood in the beginning. The Senate bill limited the holder of any primary contract to one contract. The House liberalized that provision by permitting the holder of a primary contract to hold two additional secondary contracts.

Under the provisions of the bill the four transcontinentals and the east and west coastal lines will be primary lines, and each contractor operating a primary line may hold two secondary lines. This limitation will eliminate the possibility of a monopoly of the Service in any section of the country; it will also permit of improved service and more satisfactory arrangements between the several lines serving the same general territory. The west coast line will serve as a North and South connecting link for all four transcontinentals.

If we give any one of the primary lines a monopoly on any section of the country there will be dissatisfaction resulting from claims of discrimination. We had that difficulty in the past, and the only way the matter could be solved was to extend paralleling service to two of the transcontinental lines. A transcontinental line cannot be successful if it is limited in its eastern or western termini. Each should have access to the principal cities of the east and west coasts. To bring such a condition about the coastal lines were listed as primary lines.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Is there anything in the bill to compel companies to build a certain type of ship, so that in case of war it could be used for national defense?

Mr. MEAD. Yes. The Department of Commerce has to do with the specifications with regard to the ships. There is also in the bill the creation of a commission that will study that question. The ships now in use and the personnel, the pilots and mechanics, would all be useful to the Government in time of war. They would prove to be most helpful to the national defense.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The reason I ask that question is because I understand the European countries insist that all commercial planes must be built so that they can be used for the national defense in case of emergency.

Mr. MEAD. And that should be done here also.

The Senate bill eliminated the subsidy when the present contracts were extended. The House conferees insisted that there should be a continuation of the subsidy policy until such time as the weaker lines were able to stand upon their own feet. As a result, the subsidy payments where necessary are permissible until July 1, 1939. That will give this commission some opportunity to study the question of the subsidy.

The Senate limited the amount of pay to 30 cents per mile for 300 pounds of mail carried. The House insisted upon an increase, and it was granted, to 33⅓ cents per mile for 300 pounds of mail. Holding companies were not barred by the House bill, but holding companies, affiliates, associates, and subsidiaries, were eliminated in the Senate bill. The House, believing that it would be a hardship on some of the contractors to do that immediately, succeeded in postponing such action until January 1, 1935. This postponement will give the commission created under the bill an opportunity to study the question, although it will be impossible for them to make their report to Congress in time to secure legislation.

The interchange of pilots has been left to the commission. The military training of pilots now in the Air Mail Service has been left to the commission also, and several other matters of minor importance have likewise been left to the commission to study. It must be understood that this commission is not limited to a study of Air Mail Service. This commission will study manufacturing and experimentation in aircraft production, military and naval aviation, and many other phases of the subject. There is abundant work for the commission created under this bill.

It is true that we validated the temporary 3-month contracts, but there is another reason for that action other than the reasons which were given to the House this afternoon. We validated those contracts, and we permitted their extension for the 9-month period, but we compel the contractor to sign an agreement in writing that he will carry out all the provisions and requirements contained in this act. That means that the pilots and mechanics will have a right to organize and bargain collectively; that their wage scales and working conditions will be protected.

This bill gives the independents a real opportunity to come into the air-mail picture. We make possible the expansion of the Service and we give to some States and many cities a service they never enjoyed before. The Post Office Department very willingly relinquished much of their authority in the conduct of the Air Mail Service, and the House and Senate conferees agreed upon provisions that will permit a review of the contracts by the Comptroller and a review of the rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission. We require the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a survey of the rates paid at least annually, and if any contractor is receiving in excess of a reasonable amount, we require a reduction in that specific case. In no case do we allow the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Postmaster General, or the Comptroller or any other agency of the Government to do what was done in the past—to extend franchises or to increase rates.

We permit only the downward revision of rates paid for air-mail service. Mr. Speaker, we have been liberal in our treatment of the contractors whose contracts have been canceled. We have insured to the Government a saving of over $6,000,000, an honest service, an expanded service, a service of which I believe you and I and the country at large will be proud.

CONFERENCE REPORT, S. 3170—AN EXPLANATION

While the House committee believes that air mail could be carried much cheaper than it has been in the past, it did not deem it advisable to cripple the development of the Air Mail Service by suddenly reducing the rates of compensation of the carriers and destroying the organization, personnel, and equipment developed to carry air mail. For that reason it accepted the 6-cent postage rate fixed in the Senate bill, which by reason of the desired policy of keeping the cost of air-mail transportation within the revenue therefrom, will aid in maintaining the service of the carriers, while at the same time increase the amount of air mail carried because of the lower rate as compared to the rate now in force. The definition of air mail was expanded to include mail of all classes prepaid at the air-mail rate, instead of being limited to the first class as provided in the Senate bill and in existing law. The Senate bill provided that no payment by way of subsidy should be made for carrying air mail, and the protection of the public in this feature is retained in the conference agreement secured by the House, except that the effective date of the policy is postponed until July 1, 1939, in anticipation of development of the volume of air mail and increase in the revenue therefrom before such date.

The Senate bill fixed the rate of pay at 30 cents per airplane-mile for a load of 300 pounds, and the House conferees secured a rate of 33½ cents per airplane-mile. This is, of course, a maximum which may be bid and paid, and was secured by the House in the belief that the rate should not be so low as to encourage mushroom development of airlines and air-mail companies with inadequate equipment and personnel. At the same time, provisions were retained in the conference agreement as a check upon undue profits by air-mail contractors, among them being examination and audit by the Postmaster General, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and an annual check-up by the Interstate Commerce Commission, of rates, with a view to disclosing any unreasonable profits.

The Senate bill authorized the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine the public convenience and necessity for all transportation routes and the fair and reasonable rates of compensation for transportation of air mail by airplane common carriers. The House committee and conferees believe that in view of the provision for a commission on aviation policy it would be better to leave the question of control of the establishment of routes in the hands of the Postmaster General until the said commission could report a permanent policy. The conference agreement authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rates of compensation only and adds provisions for the protection of the public and of the carriers as to the means of determining reasonable rates and the enforcement thereof.

The conference agreement permits the indefinite extension of any contract awarded under the act subject to the safeguarding provisions contained in section 6 (c) and permits the extension of emergency contracts now in force for periods not exceeding 9 months at rates not exceeding those in the contracts or in the act.

The Senate bill contained in section 7 thereof provisions designed to punish air-mail contractors whose contracts were canceled in February 1934 and to prevent any recurrence of the alleged collusion on which such cancelation was based. Some members of the House committee believe that certain of these provisions were in the nature of a bill of attainder. For that reason it secured the postponement of such provisions until January 1, 1935, in order to enable such air-mail contractors to reorganize their affairs and their relations with other companies, qualify under the new provisions, and still retain for the benefit of the public the benefits of the trained personnel and organization and existing facilities of such companies. The conference agreement permits contractors whose contracts were canceled to bid for contracts under the act if they have divested themselves of interest in other air-mail companies, other aviation-manufacturing companies, and discharged any individuals connected with such companies who were directly concerned with the alleged unlawful combination and collusion in connection with the canceled contracts. The agreement exempts from such discharge any employee of a company who was not an executive or managerial officer of the company, and permits the Postmaster General to accept an affidavit of the bidder or an officer thereof as evidence that such bidder or officer has not participated in any collusive agreement with respect to air-mail contracts.

The Senate bill provided for the initiation of retirement agreements between air-mail contractors and their pilots and mechanics. The House conferees believe that such a provision would be unduly burdensome on the air-mail contractors at the present time and believe that the development of a policy on the retirement of pilots and mechanics should be left to the Aviation Commission. The authority to initiate agreements was modified and made wholly permissive by authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to approve such agreements in case air-mail contractors and their pilots found it desirable to enter into any such contract.

The Senate bill forbade any air-mail contractor to hold more than one contract for carrying air mail. The House conferees believe that this was unduly restrictive and secured a modification permitting air-mail contractors to hold not more than three contracts, but provided that the contractor of a primary route—that is, a transcontinental or coastal route—should not hold a contract for any other primary route. The provision against merger companies operating parallel routes was retained.

The Senate bill empowered the Postmaster General to cancel any contract in case of failure by the contractor to comply with its terms or the provisions of the act. Your conferees believe that this provision was unduly arbitrary and it was modified to provide for cancelation only in the case of willful failure to so comply.

The Senate bill in sections 14, 15, and 16 contained elaborate provisions relating to interchange of personnel between the military and naval services and the commercial mail service. Your conferees were of the opinion that these provisions might be unduly complicated and burdensome because of the lack of any experience or investigation on which to base such a policy. The provisions were omitted from the bill with the expectation that the Commission on Aviation Policy would report findings on the question of training of personnel in the military and commercial air services.

Sections 12 and 13 of the Senate bill corresponding closely to sections 8 and 9 of the House amendment, and intended to protect pilots, mechanics, and laborers of the air-mail contractors in respect of their safety, pay, and working conditions, were retained in the conference agreement with only slight modifications designed to make them more effective in behalf of such pilots and other employees.

The House conferees believe that too arbitrary powers should not be vested in the Postmaster General, and for that reason insisted on provisions providing for an appeal from the Postmaster General to the Comptroller General in the awarding of contracts in case the Postmaster General held that a low bidder is not responsible to qualify under the act, and also provided that in case only one bid, or excessive bids were received, they should be submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission for its direction before awarding any contract. The Postmaster General is also limited in granting extensions of routes to one extension to any one contractor, and not in excess of 100 miles. The aggregate air-mail routes shall not exceed 29,000 miles, and the annual aggregate of air-mail schedules shall not exceed 40,000,000 airplane-miles.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BACON) there were—ayes 70, noes 35.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 261, nays 72, not voting 98, as follows:

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 8617) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2980) to modify the effect of certain Chippewa Indian treaties on areas in Minnesota.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain the bill?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, this bill is companion to the bill of the House, H.R. 7549, introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON]. I may say to the gentleman from New York that Mr. KNUTSON's Indians speak a different language from mine and I am not entirely familiar with it; so I should like to have someone who speaks their language explain the bill.

Mr. SNELL. There is no one here who can speak the language so we had better pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the passage of this act lands in Minnesota ceded to the United States by the treaty of September 30, 1854 (10 Stat.L. 1109), between the United States and the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior and the Mississippi and by the treaty of February 22, 1855 (10 Stat.L. 1165), between the United States and the Mississippi Bands of Chippewa Indians, shall no longer be considered as "Indian country" for the purposes of article 7 of said treaties: Provided, That in that portion in the said State of Minnesota affected by this act the Indian liquor laws shall continue to apply to the sale, gift, barter, exchange, etc., of liquors to ward Indians of the classes set forth in the act of January 30, 1897 (29 Stat.L. 506), and to the manufacture or sale of liquors on individual Indian allotments or other individual Indian-owned lands while the title to same is held in trust by the United States or while the same shall remain inalienably by the Indian without the consent of some governmental officer.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DECENTRALIZATION OF GOVERNMENT

The SPEAKER. Under the special order for today the gentleman from Texas [Mr. TERRELL] is recognized at this time for 30 minutes.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as one who subscribes to the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, and a believer in the political philosophy of Thomas Jefferson, I desire to discuss the decentralization of government as the only escape from destruction of government. You may not be interested in what I say, but I am quoting from former Presidents and Governors, all great Democrats, and you should be interested in what they say.

Being a new Member I have naturally refrained from taking an active part in the discussions of legislative questions, knowing that long service or seniority counted most in Congress. I have watched the proceedings with profound interest and much apprehension as I witness the daily departure from what I was taught to believe to be the principles of the Democratic Party and the powers of the Federal Government as prescribed in the Constitution.

This Government was formed in 1787 by delegates from the Colonies, who desired to amend the Articles of Confederation in order to bind them together in stronger ties, as they had voluntarily bound themselves together to win their independence from England.

After many months of serious consideration, and at times almost despairing of reaching any beneficial results, they adopted the present Constitution as the best compromise they could make, and not entirely satisfactory to either side of the opposing forces. But I consider it the greatest document ever written by man for the proper government of man.

This Constitution has stood the test of time, with the adoption of certain amendments to meet changed conditions or popular demand, and it can be amended to meet all emergencies. Congress should never resort to the dangerous expedient of enacting legislation unauthorized under the guise of emergency. Violating the Constitution does more harm in the long run than the good accomplished by illegal legislation.

The Constitution divides the Government into three divisions clearly defined—the legislative, executive, and judicial—and the duties and powers of each are clearly defined, and neither division has any authority except that given up by the States and conferred upon the General Government.

There are some implied powers, but they so closely follow expressed powers, and are intended to complete them, that there should be no controversy about them. For instance, the power to declare war carries with it the power to provide the means to prosecute the war. The power to coin money and regulate its value carries with it the power to distribute the money to the people—either through Government agencies or through private banks, as is now being done. I thought that when the Federal Reserve System was being established that it would be a Government agency to distribute the money to the people and the Government would receive the benefits, but in this I was sadly mistaken. The Reserve System, with a capital of $145,000,000, has issued more than $3,000,000,000 in Federal Reserve notes on the credit of the United States, and the Government should have received this tremendous profit instead of giving it to the private banks. I believe the Government should own and control the Federal Reserve banks for the benefit of all the people.

Our Government was simple, with simple machinery, when it was organized, and its powers and functions were easily understood by the officers and the laymen at that time, and it should have been kept that way by the addition of only enough governmental machinery and extra employees to meet the growing population and business of the country; and a government of larger units should operate cheaper proportionately than one with smaller units and fewer activities, but the reverse has been true with our Government.

The great danger to our Government and its institutions is the rapid growth of bureaucracy, with various appointive commissions, boards, and bureaus far removed from the people, administering laws affecting every activity of the citizens in their various business operations. These boards and bureaus have authority to make rules and regulations imposing penalties for their violation, carrying heavy fines and imprisonment which virtually denies a fair trial as contemplated by the Constitution.

In order to present this matter in a comprehensive manner, to show the rapid growth of bureaucratic government, I present here two tables—the first showing the date of the creation of each Cabinet position, independent office, board, or bureau, and the number of employees and appropriations the first year—where the information is available—and the number of employees and appropriations for the year 1934. The second table shows total appropriations for all departments and activities of the Government, taken from the Budget as prepared by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget for 1934. These tables will appear at the end of my address.

The tables show that there are now on the pay roll of the Government 764,573 regular employees and 459,355 temporary employees, many of whom will become permanent, making a total of 1,223,928 employees, with total salaries of $1,227,992,770. The second table shows that the total appropriations for all departments and activities, including emergency, temporary, and permanent appropriations, taken from the Budget for 1934, amount to $7,648,703,028.67. The figures are official, though there are necessarily some discrepancies caused by permanent appropriations and the shifting of these appropriations from one department to another and the uncertainty of the tenure of temporary employees.

Many small boards and bureaus are omitted for lack of space and because they are under the control and supervision of some executive department and the appropriations are carried under said departments.

Starting out in 1789 with three Cabinet positions, the Department of Foreign Affairs—now called the Department of State—the Treasury Department, and War Department, with few employees, and insignificant appropriations, the Government has now grown to immense proportions, with 10 Cabinet officers at $15,000 each per annum, 9 Supreme Court Justices, with the Chief Justice drawing a salary of $20,500, and 8 Associate Justices with salaries of $20,000 each, and with 225 Federal judges throughout the United States and many independent offices, commissions, boards, and bureaus, with fancy salaries attached.

If anybody can tell me where we are headed for, I would be glad to have some comforting information, as I believe we are headed for the rocks. Of course, we have a great country—the richest in the world—and we talk about the "land of the free and the home of the brave"; but where does our freedom come in and in what does our bravery consist?

Are we free, when the Government tells every farmer how much land he can plant and how much of a particular crop he can grow and sell; and when it tells every business man how he shall operate his business; how many hours a day he shall operate; what wages he shall pay and what price he shall charge for his products? If this is not planned regimentation and Government dictation, I do not know what to call it.

Are we brave, when we cowardly submit to some bureau officer from Washington coming out to our place of business and telling us that Uncle Sam says you shall do this and you shall not do that? If this is liberty or bravery, Mr. Webster ought to make another dictionary.

The Democratic platform says: "We advocate the strengthening and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws to prevent monopoly and unfair trade practices." Now these laws are repealed or suspended in the air while trade agreements and price-fixing are protected by law. How much longer will the country stand for the benign principle of fining and jailing a man because he presses a suit of clothes or sells a bottle of milk cheaper than a Government regulation specifies? Again, the platform says: "We advocate the removal of the Government from all fields of private enterprise." Instead of being removed, the Government is being extended further into all fields of private enterprise. It is immaterial whether it is called revolution or evolution, it is a fundamental change in our Government just the same. Changing the name of a rose does not change its scent. The "cracking-down" process has cracked the patience of the people and popular sentiment for the N.R.A. is fast waning, and its control of business should be dropped before the collapse comes; and combinations in restraint of trade should be prohibited by the rigid enforcement of the antitrust laws.

If the National Recovery Act, with its codes regulating industry within the States, and the Cotton Production Control Act, limiting production in the States, are held constitutional by the Supreme Court, there is nothing Congress cannot do to extend Federal authority over the States and control every activity of the citizens within the States, and local self-government would be a hollow mockery.

It was well understood at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and for many years thereafter, that the States had given up certain specific powers to the Federal Government and retained all powers not granted to the General Government, and to place the matter beyond future controversy, the tenth amendment was adopted immediately after the ratification of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

I should like to ask if this language does not confine the activities of the Congress to the powers specifically conferred by the Constitution. This was the view held by the Congress and the courts for more than a century, and if, perchance, the Congress overstepped its authority the President called the hand of Congress by a veto message that could not be misunderstood, and if the illegal measure escaped a veto of the President, the Supreme Court stood ready to strike it down and protect the rights of the people. Now the Government is considered from a national standpoint, like the monarchies of Europe and not as a republic of limited powers conferred by independent States, as provided in the Constitution.

In 1859, Congress passed a law appropriating public lands and land scrip to the States to establish agricultural and mechanical colleges, and President Buchanan vetoed the bill as "inexpedient and unconstitutional." Since that time the Morrill Act, the Hatch Act, the Smith-Lever Act, and others have been enacted establishing and perpetuating these colleges in the States, with annual Federal appropriations, when the Constitutional Convention had voted down every resolution offered in the convention to establish and finance colleges or schools of any kind in the States.

I quote from the veto message of President Buchanan:

> I return with my objections to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories, which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts."
> I shall proceed to state my objections to this bill. I deem it to be both inexpedient and unconstitutional.
> Waiving for the present the question of constitutional power, what effect will this bill have on the relations established between the Federal and State Governments? The Constitution is a grant to Congress of a few enumerated, but most important powers relating chiefly to war, peace, foreign and domestic commerce, negotiations, and other subjects which can be best, or alone, exercised beneficially by the common Government. All other powers are reserved to the States and to the people. For the efficient and harmonious working of both, it is necessary that their several spheres of action should be kept distinct from each other. This can alone prevent conflict and mutual injury.
> Should the time ever arrive when the State governments shall look to the Federal Treasury for the means of supporting themselves and maintaining their systems of education and internal policy, the character of both governments will be greatly deteriorated.

That time is here now.

It is extremely doubtful, to say the least, whether this bill would contribute to the advancement of agriculture and the mechanic arts—objects the dignity and value of which cannot be too highly appreciated. The Federal Government which makes the donation has confessedly no constitutional power to follow it into the States and enforce the application of the fund to the intended objects. As donors we shall possess no control over our own gift after it shall have passed from our hand. The Federal Government has no power to compel the execution of the trust.

Does Congress possess the power under the Constitution to make a donation of public lands to the different States to provide colleges for the purposes of educating their own people? I presume the general proposition is undeniable that Congress does not possess the power to appropriate money in the Treasury, raised by taxes on the people of the United States, for the purpose of educating the people of the respective States.

It is doing this now.

It will not be pretended that any such power is to be found among the specific powers granted to Congress nor that "it is necessary and proper for carrying into execution" any one of these powers.

Should Congress exercise such a power, this would be to break down the barriers which have been so carefully constructed in the Constitution to separate Federal from State authority. We should then not only "lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" for Federal purposes, but for every State purpose which Congress might deem expedient or useful. This would be an actual consolidation of the Federal and State Governments, so far as the great taxing power is concerned, and constitute a sort of partnership between the two in the Treasury of the United States, equally ruinous to both.

This language of President Buchanan is prophetic of everything now being done and that has been done since the Congress met in March of last year, and should be a warning to future Congresses to return to constitutional government before all State lines have been blotted out and the wellsprings of freedom have completely dried up.

In 1887 Congress appropriated $10,000 to purchase planting seed for farmers in west Texas because of a severe drought and failure of crops. President Cleveland vetoed this bill, and I quote from his veto message as follows:

I return without my approval House bill no. 10203, an act to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to make a special distribution of seed in the drought-stricken counties of Texas, and making an appropriation therefor.

It is represented that a long, continued, and extensive drought has existed in certain portions of the State of Texas, resulting in a failure of crops and consequent distress and destitution. Yet I feel obliged to withhold my approval of the plan as proposed by this bill to indulge a benevolent and charitable sentiment through the appropriation of public funds for that purpose.

I can find no warrant for such an appropriation in the Constitution, and I do not believe that the power and duty of the General Government ought to be extended to the relief of individual suffering, which is in no manner properly related to the public service or benefit.

How does this message compare with the practice of today in which the Government is lending and giving away billions of the taxpayers' money? There is but one reason for these loans and donations to the States, some of which were made before the depression began, and that is to make a political record by getting Federal appropriations for State purposes with the idea of getting something for nothing, which is a false idea, as these loans and donations must be paid with interest by the taxpayers.

We have passed through the panics of 1837, 1873, 1893, 1907, and 1920 without violating the Constitution and without loading the country down with billions of dollars of bonded debt, and we could have passed through this banker's panic without violating the Constitution or loading the country down with debt if we had provided the country with ample currency to transact the business. Panics and emergencies do not change the meaning of constitutions; they make excuses for violating them.

This panic in the midst of plenty is a crime, and the Government is responsible for it, but it cannot be relieved by issuing billions of dollars in interest-bearing bonds and taxing the people to pay the principal and interest on the bonds and giving the money away to States and individuals. It must be relieved by removing the causes that produced it—the lack of a proper monetary system—and establish and maintain a system adequate to meet the needs of agriculture, industry, and commerce.

When the panic of 1837 struck in full force, President Van Buren sent a message to Congress outlining his recovery plans, in which he said:

The preceding suggestions and recommendations are submitted in the belief that their adoption by Congress will enable the executive department to conduct our fiscal concerns with success, so far as their management has been committed to it. Whilst the objects and the means proposed to attain them are within its constitutional powers and appropriate duties, they will at the same time, it is hoped, by their necessary operation afford essential aid in the transaction of individual concerns, and thus yield relief to the people at large in a form adapted to the nature of our Government.

Those who look to the action of this Government for specific aid to the citizen to relieve embarrassments arising from losses by revulsions in commerce and credit lose sight of the ends for which it was created and the powers with which it is clothed. It was established to give security to us all in our lawful and honorable pursuits under the lasting safeguard of republican institutions. It was not intended to confer special favors on individuals or on any classes of them; to create systems of agriculture, manufactures, or trade; or to engage in them, either separately or in connection with individual citizens or organized associations.

If its operations were to be directed for the benefit of any one class, equivalent favors must in justice be extended to the rest; and the attempt to bestow such favors with an equal hand or even to select those who should most deserve them would never be successful. All communities are apt to look to government for too much. Even in our own country, where its powers and duties are so strictly limited, we are prone to do so, especially at periods of sudden embarrassment and distress. But this ought not to be.

The framers of our excellent Constitution and the people who approved it with calm and sagacious deliberation acted at the time on a sounder principle. They wisely judged that the less government interferes with private pursuits the better for the general prosperity. It is not its legitimate object to make men rich or to repair by direct grants of money or legislation in favor of particular pursuits losses not incurred in the public service. This would be substantially to use the property of some for the benefit of others. But its real duty—that duty the performance of which makes a good government the most precious of human blessings—is to enact and enforce a system of general laws commensurate with, but not exceeding, the objects of its establishment; and to leave every citizen and every interest to reap, under its benign protection, the rewards of virtue, industry, and prudence.

We hear much about decentralization of government and abolishment of Federal boards and bureaus, but nothing is being done about it. The distinguished Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. SUMNERS, made a very interesting speech on the subject of decentralizing the Government and said that it must be done but the time has not come for it—that we must first get out of the depression.

I think one of the first steps to enable us to get out of the depression is to abolish about half the boards and bureaus and lessen the tax burdens of government by taking the tax eaters off our backs and reducing the exorbitant taxes, and stop issuing interest-bearing, tax-exempt bonds, which constitute an interest debt of practically a billion dollars annually. This Government cannot borrow itself out of debt on into prosperity. It cannot survive on bond issues and taxes. No individual or government can live beyond its income without bankruptcy. Take the iron hand of big business from the throat of little business by the rigid enforcement of the antitrust laws, and business will survive and liberty will be safe.

Strike the shackles from agriculture and industry and restore initiative, faith, and hope for the future. Let Congress coin money and regulate its value until the products of farm and factory reach the price level of 1926, and hold that price level at a fair exchange price between the value of products and the value of the dollar, in order that purchasing power may be created and maintained and business recovery may be made permanent.

The Democratic platform declares for a reduction of 25 percent in governmental expenses, and this cannot be done unless we materially reduce salaries or stop many of the activities of the Government, and I favor doing both by reducing the higher salaries much more than the lower ones, and stopping 25 percent of the activities of the Government.

We have a great many boards and bureaus performing functions which the Government is not authorized to perform by any express provision of the Constitution, and were never intended to be performed by the framers of the Constitution.

The Office of Education in the Department of the Interior started out with 4 employees and an appropriation of $18,000 and now has an appropriation of $310,000 for administration and 83 employees. In addition to this it has an appropriation of $10,902,700 to be expended in various educational activities in the States. The entire field of public education was left to the States and every dollar of Federal taxes spent for educational purposes in the States is not legally expended, and should be stopped. I am in favor of the best public-school system that can be had, and in favor of higher education, but these are purely State matters with which the Federal Government has no legal authority. Texas has a great university, a great agricultural and mechanical college, a college of industrial arts for girls, a technological college, and a number of splendid teacher's colleges, and a splendid public-school system with consolidated high schools throughout the State, and I will not ask Congress to violate the Constitution in order that we may receive Federal aid for agriculture or education. I have written those who requested me to support appropriations for education in the States that such expenditures were illegal and I would not support them.

Besides the appropriations for the regular and legitimate activities of the Government, the Federal Government has spent many millions more, and is still spending money for education in the States. I do not believe that anyone who has ever read the Constitution will seriously contend that such expenditures are authorized by the Constitution. I cannot understand why Congress will continue to make these illegal appropriations.

Federal appropriations for education in the States have been challenged by some of the ablest exponents of the Constitution in Congress, but they have been unable to stop these illegal appropriations.

The Federal Civil Service Commission is one of the most overrated agencies ever established by any government to tax the people to perpetuate jobs. It has an annual appropriation of $1,050,000 in order to make it possible for persons who once succeed in getting on the Government pay roll to hold the job for the remainder of their lives, or until they become too old to work and then retire on a pension for life.

I am opposed to life tenure in office. The passing of a civil-service examination does not qualify any person for a position. He must have inherent qualities and energy and a will to work and practice to make him efficient. The examination is only one factor in determining the qualifications. [Applause.]

The making of any kind of grade in any examination does not qualify anyone for a Government position. I can pick out a number of men or women in my town who would make splendid postmasters, who might not make a passing grade in a civil-service examination. But I am required to recommend one of the three applicants making the highest grade for postmaster, and the grading to be done in Washington. Yet this is no test of a person's qualification for postmaster. I should like to see this farce of civil-service examination abolished, yet many people think it very important. Its primary purpose was and is to put people on the pay roll through these examinations and keep them there through Executive order and prevent other worthy people from getting these positions.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, this is perhaps one of the best speeches we have heard during the Seventy-third Congress. I hope the gentleman may be given such time as he needs to complete his speech.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Texas is, of course, making a very illuminating and very interesting address, but we are under a great pressure for the consideration of some rules that are to be called up today. How much more time does the gentleman need?

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I shall need about 7 minutes more.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may be allowed to proceed for 7 additional minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I am forced to object to any extension of the gentleman's time.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that this is probably the only time our colleague has attempted to make an extended address and I think he certainly should be permitted to conclude his speech. I therefore ask that the gentleman be given 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of my inquiry was simply to ascertain how much longer the gentleman would need. I have no objection to his being given another 10 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PEYSER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I held an executive office for 10 years and employed many people, and it was to my interest, both from a business and political standpoint, to employ the very best people I could get to do the work, and I discharged only two or three for incompetency or other causes during the 10 years, and I could not have gotten more capable people under civil-service examination. No sensible public official is going to discharge all his experienced workers and employ inefficient help. It would be bad business and bad politics. Employees should, of course, be qualified in education and ability to do the work; but integrity and loyalty—the most important qualifications—are not shown in civil-service examinations. [Applause.]

The Department of Agriculture was established in 1862 under a commissioner with a salary of $3,000 a year, with a few employees, and nothing to do. It was made a Cabinet position in 1889, with the title changed to Secretary of Agriculture.

Now the salary is $15,000, with 32,601 employees, and a regular appropriation of $210,512,207, and a special appropriation, including all funds collected under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, of $955,379,811, making a total of $1,065,892,018. It has hundreds of experts giving advice on every conceivable subject from building silos to pickling pigs feet, and from baby-beef clubs to making baby dresses, and with "brain trusters" directing the social evolution.

There is but one reasonable excuse for a Federal Department of Agriculture, and that is for quarantine purposes to protect the States against insect pests and dangerous diseases of plants and livestock, which insects and diseases do not respect State lines; and this should be called a "quarantine commission", and not a Department of Agriculture.

The Constitution does not authorize Congress to appropriate any money for agriculture in the States, and the Government has no business controlling agricultural operations in the States.

The Government should have a capable quarantine commission to give protection to the States against the spread of these diseases and insect pests wherever it is possible to do this by quarantine measures. I would not give 30 cents for all the educational work and expert advice given through the Agricultural Department, which is now costing a billion dollars a year.

With one set of agricultural advisers teaching the farmers to produce more and another bunch paying them to make less and destroy a part of what they had already made, the Government wires must be crossed somewhere. This agricultural work should be done by the States and every State should have a strong department of agriculture and a good school of agriculture.

The Department of Labor was established in 1913 with 1,906 employees. It now has 4,345, with an appropriation of $16,522,477.11.

There is no real reason for this Department, except to furnish soft jobs for those who prefer to advise workers rather than work themselves. [Applause.]

An arbitration board to adjust labor disputes affecting laborers engaged in interstate commerce might be valid and might be of some benefit in an advisory capacity, but it would have no authority to make people work or to punish them for not working. All these matters, including child-labor laws, can best be administered by State laws in the States where the laborers reside and the controversies arise.

I am firmly of the conviction that our Government is vastly overorganized and overmanned, and that the best service Congress can render would be to immediately begin decentralization and take everything away from the Federal Government not authorized by the Constitution and every agency that can be better managed by the States. It is not possible for any person to know what boards and bureaus can best be abolished without destroying any useful and necessary service unless he has made a thorough study of the work being done by these boards and bureaus, and I have mentioned only a few that I believe can be abolished without injury to the public, but there are many others that ought to be abolished and would do no harm, except to hurt the feelings of those who lose their jobs.

The Democratic platform says:

> We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance to accomplish a saving or not less than 25 percent in the cost of the Federal Government.

This Congress ought to appoint a committee of its own Members to make a thorough study of the boards and commissions during vacation and report to the next Congress and recommend the abolishment of all boards and bureaus whose work is not absolutely necessary, or where the work can best be done by the States, and I have introduced a resolution providing for the appointment of such a committee. It is very likely that at least 25 percent of all work performed by these boards and bureaus can be abolished without detriment to the people or be left to the States, and this would be a great saving to the taxpayers.

I believe in very little governmental machinery; in keeping out of debt; in obeying the laws; and following the Constitution.

Texas once had a great Governor, whose name was O. M. Roberts. He was criticized by his opponents for his economy in holding down expenses to the receipts of the government and for vetoing extravagant appropriations and illegal laws. They said: "Governor, you will send the State to hell by your niggardly policy." He replied: "If the State goes to hell, she will go according to law and pay her way as she goes." [Applause.]

When I witness the extravagant and illegal appropriations made and the vast bonded debt created by this Congress, I can only wish we had more men like Governor Roberts in legislative and executive positions.

The Government is now becoming unwieldy and top-heavy and may fall by its own weight like the Insull power empire. You may say that the Insull power empire fell because of graft and corruption. This doubtless hastened its fall, but can anybody say that there is no graft in the billions of dollars now being expended by the Government?

These billions of dollars expended for relief and other purposes have doubtless aided in recovery by increasing purchasing power and stimulating business, but instead of donating 30 percent of it and loaning 70 percent for illegal and sometimes useless purposes, it could have been expended legally on post roads through the commissioners' courts of the various counties wherever the mail is carried, at little cost to the Government, and with the highest percent of labor employment and the greatest benefit to the people. I hope the Senate will pass the House bill authorizing $400,000,000 for highway construction and allocating 25 percent for rural highways. While I do not expect this much, I trust the Senate will be liberal.

A network of rural highways of a permanent character could have been built through every county and the people would have received lasting benefits for these vast expenditures, but the most of the money has been spent on State, municipal, and private projects (non-Federal projects) for which Congress has no legal right to expend taxpayers' money.

The Democratic Party has almost abandoned its time-honored principles of strict construction of the Constitution and States' rights, and is now advocating Federal control of agriculture and industry, and even Federal enforcement of criminal laws within the States.

The late Governor James Stephen Hogg, of Texas, was one of the greatest Governors any State ever had, and he vetoed an act of the Legislature of the State of Texas accepting the sugar bounty offered by the Federal Government on sugar grown on State convict farms. In his veto message he said in part:

> This act requires the State to apply for and procure a license from and give bond to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the privilege of producing sugar on her own land in order to secure the bounty. While, to my mind, the act is clearly unconstitutional, and, without reference to the organic law, is void and would be so held by a circumspect court, but as Congress has seen fit to pass it, I shall base my action herein on other grounds.
> The State is sovereign of her own affairs and cannot be disturbed in the legitimate exercise of her prerogatives. If she desires to raise sugar by convict labor, under no circumstances could she with propriety ask or accept from any government a license to do so; nor could she yield to a supervision of her affairs by any officer not subordinate to her own laws. To do so in one instance would lead to another, and finally to supervision by the Federal Government over the cotton patches, wheat fields, stock ranches, lumber yards, and factories within her limits. Precedents by Government usurptions become stronger than law. The worse they are, the more difficult to overthrow. When they are erected on the destruction of the Constitution, like this bounty act, the wrong which produced them strengthens as the fruits of the crime spread, until they become fastened forever on the people.
> There can be no more reason to support a bounty on sugar than on cotton, grain, tobacco, or stock. Two cents a pound offered by the Government is but the beginning. Let it stand and there must be a premium also on every article produced within the United States. With the premium goes the license; and coupled onto the license follows Federal supervision. So will end the last vestige of State sovereignty.

It will not be surprising in the next national campaign to see the two parties completely reverse their former positions on policies and principles, and to see the Democratic Party advocating a strong central government of the Hamiltonian type and the Republican Party advocating Jeffersonian principles of State's rights and individual liberty. [Applause.] This is a logical conclusion based upon the present course of the Democratic Party. Politics make strange bedfellows.

If the Democratic Party does not begin immediately to repeal these federalistic laws, decentralize the Government, and return to the principles of Jefferson and Jackson—which principles will never die—its days are numbered and some other party will arise upon its ruins and take the reins of government, and the Republican Party may be wise enough to avail itself of this opportunity. This would be an anomaly in government, but stranger things have happened.

My State has been under six flags. She has been a Province of Spain, France, and Mexico, a State of the Confederacy, a republic, and finally a State of the Union under the Stars and Stripes. She voluntarily entered the Union, retaining her public domain and her self-respect, but she has lost her self-respect by bartering away her sovereignty for a mess of Federal pottage. [Applause.]

I would rather return to Texas and live under our lone-star flag as an independent republic than to become a step-child of a soviet union which we are fast approaching.

I am for this Republic and democratic principles 100 percent, but if we shall have the Republic in name and form only, without the substance, I am for a smaller union of States, where we can have a republic in both form and substance.

If we must have a government controlled by the international bankers of Wall Street and Lombard Street, who hold their stocks and bonds and clip coupons and control the Governments of two nations, then give me the South and West for my country, where the wheat and corn, the cotton, cattle, and cane, and the fruits of the field flourish to feed and clothe the hungry hordes of the earth. [Applause.]

Let the Shylocks of high finance hoard their money and eat their stocks and bonds, but give me a country that produces the real wealth that sustains human life and a Government that will protect the wealth they create, and guarantee freedom in the enjoyment of the fruits of their labor and I will ask nothing more and be satisfied with nothing less.

We must choose between decentralization or destruction. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 401

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 9745, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. 6-HOUR DAY AND 5-DAY WEEK

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, first of all may I make clear just what the Committee on Labor is trying to do with petition no. 30 for the 30-hour week bill which I have on the desk and which now has, I believe, 76 names.

This petition seeks to discharge the Committee on Rules from further consideration of S. 158, a bill introduced by Senator HUGO BLACK, of Alabama, which bill passed the United States Senate during the last session of Congress by a large majority. This bill was referred to the Committee on Labor of the House and was amended by our committee. Then I asked for a rule to bring up the bill in the House. We were unable to get a rule, so now we are moving to discharge the Rules Committee from the further consideration of the bill (S. 158) and hope to bring this bill up for action on June 11.

The Committee on Labor amended the bill, but when we bring the bill up on June 11 we do not intend to ask the House to pass the bill as amended by the Committee on Labor during the last session. I intend, if the Labor Committee agrees, to ask the House to pass the bill, S. 158, just as it passed the Senate, and then the bill will go immediately to the President for his signature.

I am going to read this bill into the RECORD so that the Members will have an opportunity to know what is in the bill, which is a very short one. There are several whereases at the start, then the bill provides as follows:

That no article or commodity except milk and/or its products shall be shipped, transported, or delivered in interstate or foreign commerce, which was produced or manufactured in any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment situated in the United States, in which any person, except officers, executives, and superintendents, and their personal and immediate clerical assistants, was employed or permitted to work more than 5 days in any week or more than 6 hours in any day: Provided, That this section shall not apply to commodities which a cannery or manufacturing plant produces by canning or preparing for marketing or commerce fish, sea food, fruits, or vegetables of a perishable character: Provided further, That upon the submission of satisfactory proof of the existence of special conditions in any other industry included herein, making it necessary for certain persons to work more time than herein provided, the Secretary of Labor may issue an exemption permit in respect to such persons, relieving the commodity from the provisions of this act. Newspapers and periodicals are not included in the description of the business activities herein designated.

SEC. 2. Any person who ships, transports, or delivers, or causes to be shipped, transported, or delivered in interstate commerce, any commodities or articles contrary to the provisions of section 1 of this act, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $200 or by imprisonment for not more than 3 months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. This act shall not become effective until 30 days after the date of its enactment, and it shall not apply to commodities or articles produced or manufactured prior to the date it becomes effective; and this act shall remain in force for 2 years after the date it becomes effective. Nothing in this act shall apply to agricultural or farm products processed for first sale by the original producer.

This bill passed the Senate March 13 (calendar day, April 6), 1933.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken the floor today to give my own opinion in reference to this bill. It is merely my opinion, and I do not claim to have a cure-all for the depression, and I do not say that my word is the final open sesame to open the door to prosperity; but I do believe that as Chairman of the Committee on Labor for the past 4 years, after the hearings which have been held in our committee during this session and last session when we had before that committee every industrial leader of the United States, including the leaders of all the big industries of the United States, every big labor leader of the United States, every representative of the farmers of the United States, every representative of other labor—organized and unorganized—and industrial organizations in the United States, in hearings held during the last session and this session of Congress, sometimes beginning at 10 o'clock in the morning and running through until 7, 8, or 9 o'clock at night, that I know something about the situation. I believe as the result of these hearings, as a result of the thousands and thousands of letters which I have in files in my office, coming from every single State in this Union, after conferences with the American Federation of Labor and with representatives of organized labor and of unorganized labor not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and with leaders from every part of the country, that I do know something about what is going on in the United States today in reference to labor conditions.

I felt it was my duty as a Member of this House, with the knowledge which I possessed from these labor men and from these industrialists and the consumers all over the country, to make a statement to you today, and I say this advisedly. You have seen strikes in Toledo, you have seen Minneapolis, you have seen San Francisco, and you have seen some of the southern textile strikes—Birmingham, for instance—but, Mr. Speaker, a labor man in whom I have the greatest confidence said to me 2 days ago, "You have seen Toledo, Minneapolis, and San Francisco. That is mild. You have not yet seen the gates of hell opened, and that is what is going to happen from now on unless the Congress of the United States passes labor legislation to cure the evils which are existing in industry and which are driving these workers to desperation."

That is strong language. I do not say this to stir you up, but I say it because the man who stated those words to me probably has a better first-hand knowledge of the labor conditions in the country than anyone I know. I believe what he told me, and I dread the days that are to come, because I know that strikes mean misery, suffering, and many times bloodshed and death to the workers and their dependents. It is because I hope that Congress can prevent these things by passing labor legislation that I take your time to address you today.

The day after the agreement on the Detroit automotive situation I said that I had hoped in that agreement it would be recognized that if you ever expect industrial peace in the United States you have got to outlaw company unions. This agreement with the Detroit manufacturers was the Waterloo of labor from labor's point of view. They were up then right on the line. That agreement to recognize company unions partially and to recognize organized labor partially is the cause of your strike today in Toledo, your strike in San Francisco, and your strike in Minneapolis.

You know it is very difficult for a stepchild and the real child of the family to get along together, just as it is very difficult for a child to get along with its stepmother. Company unions are the children of big business. Trade unions are the representatives of the workers of the United States and are stepchildren to the big industrialists.

Let us start off with the premise that either trade unions are bad or they are good. If they are bad—if they are bad for the American people, if they are bad for the American Government, they should be abolished and wiped out of existence. If they are good, if they are responsible for whatever wages labor has got in the past, if they are responsible for doing away with sweatshops and the terrible living conditions of the workers in the United States, then they ought to be supported, and there is no half-way between trade unions and organized labor in the United States and the children of big industry known as "company unions."

I appeal to your common sense as men who have studied these problems; how can a group of men in any large corporation in the United States get together in a company union and have their representatives stand up and fight for the interests of the workers? Of course it cannot be done. You may say, "Why, some manufacturers are so kind-hearted that their workers do not want unions; they want to form their own organizations and deal with the kind-hearted owner of the plant who is going to take care of them and give them everything they want."

Well, I have worked. I know the feelings of men and women who work in industry. I was a foreman in the General Electric Co., the Edison Lamp Works, at East Boston, where they make lamp bulbs. I had labor experience when I was on the stage in the theatrical profession. I was in a strike in New York and was arrested for picketing on the East Side when we of the actors' union were picketing the Avenue B Theater. We were trying to get decent living conditions for the people on the stage who at that time were in vaudeville. Conditions were such, for instance, that actors would be booked to play, for instance, Keith's Theater in Washington for a week, and Monday afternoon, if they did not like your act, they fired you and you did not get paid for anything you had done or even your expenses to Washington. They had various tricks in New York whereby they would employ 10 acts for Monday afternoon; of course, all the people would come in to see the 10 acts and then they would fire five of the acts before the evening performance and pay them nothing, not even for the afternoon performance. This is just a sample of conditions at that time. We went on strike. I was arrested as a picket and taken up to the night court of New York. They put men on the stand who stated we pushed people off the sidewalk, which was all a lot of lies, because not a soul went into that theater all the time we were picketing that day, and I shall always remember the Jewish people of New York City.

The patronage of this theater was almost entirely Jewish, and they would come up to the door and when they would see us walking up and down they would just utter the one word, "Strike", and turn around and go home and not two people went into the theater that day or night, and ordinarily the theater was packed, as it was a Saturday. We were tried and we were each fined $1 after the judge told us what terrible people we were and told if we came into court the next day on the same charge we would be sent to Welfare Island for 30 days. We went on with the strike next day, picketed the same theaters again, and they found out we were not subject to arrest but were within our rights of lawful picketing, and we were not arrested.

I know something about these company unions. The man who belongs to a company union and goes to the foreman or the boss to discuss wages or hours is not a representative of labor. He is a man trying to court favor; he is a man trying to hold his job; he is a man getting special privileges; he is a man who is allowed to go around the plant and be paid for work he is not doing, when he is around spreading the propaganda, "We have a fine boss." Then the unions step in and say, "Listen, let us be Americans. Let us not be bootlickers. Let us not bow down before the boss and say, 'Please, can I have a decent living wage?' Let us be Americans under the Constitution of the United States and stand up and say, 'We demand our right to organize. We demand the right of collective bargaining.'"

Do not forget, while we are on this point, that the bulwark against communism in the United States has been your labor unions—the American Federation of Labor. [Applause.] Your unions have been the defense of the United States against communism and bolshevism and nazi-ism. They are American citizens fighting for a decent living.

Let us think this thing over. Do you think in Toledo today and in Minneapolis today and in any place else in the country where they are having strikes—do you think a man with a family of five children goes out there and is chased down the street with bayonets by the National Guard, as I saw in a picture yesterday of the strike in Toledo, does this because he likes excitement? Do you think he goes out there risking his life or to get a clubbing on the head from the police or the hired guards of these companies because he likes it? Do you think he does it with these five children at home, perhaps hungry, for such a reason as that? No; he is out there fighting for bread for these hungry little mouths. He is fighting for clothing to put on these wasted little forms. He is fighting for milk for the baby. That is what he is fighting for, and I am asking you here today if you will not pass legislation through this Congress shortening the hours by enacting the 30-hour week bill, and give them decent, living wages after you shorten the hours. Pass legislation now to take these 10,000,000 people unemployed in the United States and put them back to work.

Now, here is the legislation I think this Congress should pass. I say this is only my opinion—I do not claim to have any cure-all, but I do claim that I know a little something about it. I think this Congress should not adjourn until it passes the Black 30-hour week bill. I want to congratulate Senator BLACK on his courage and foresight for having introduced the bill and for having it passed through the Senate.

I think we ought to pass the Black bill, and I think we should pass the Wagner disputes bill, which does away with the evils of company unions, although it does not go as far as I should like to have it go. But it does bring out the principle that 7A in the N.I.R.A. gives to labor the right to bargain collectively, through representatives of their own choosing. I think we ought to pass that bill, and I think we ought to pass the Wagner-Lewis bill, the unemployment insurance bill, because that is a bill to prevent hard times, to provide funds for paying wages to workers thrown out of employment by machines until they can be reabsorbed in industry.

We ought to pass the railroad pension bill, making the railroads do their share to take care of railroad employees and retire them, thus making available thousands of jobs for the younger workers and apprentices now unable to secure employment. I believe we should pass old-age pension legislation and do away with workhouses which are relics of the age of barbarism. That is the labor legislation that we ought to pass now. What has Congress done for labor in this session of Congress; I ask you, what?

Mr. COX. What about the N.R.A.?

Mr. CONNERY. I am talking about this session of Congress; not the last session. I want to say this to my friend from Georgia [Mr. Cox]—and he is a good and sincere friend—that I think the N.R.A. is the greatest piece of legislation put on the statute books in a hundred years for labor. The N.R.A. came as the result of the Black-Connery 30-hour week bill. It abolished child labor, abolished the "yellow dog" contract, and authorized labor to bargain collectively as an organization, and upheld the right of labor to organize, and it shortened the hours by writing into the bill some other provisions of the Black-Connery bill which had been reported favorably by our Labor Committee. All the foregoing provisions I have mentioned were written into the Black-Connery 30 hour bill weeks before the N.I.R.A. was presented to Congress, and the Black-Connery bill was reported favorably to the House weeks before the N.I.R.A. was presented to either House or Senate. I say this in justice to my colleague on the Committee on Labor.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is not the gentleman mistaken? Did we not pass the bill abolishing the "yellow dog" contract long before the N.R.A. was passed?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; but that only applied to the Federal courts. You could not go into the States on an intrastate question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But it practically abolished the "yellow dog" contract.

Mr. CONNERY. No; I wish it had. But in order to get into the Federal court they had to prove diversity of citizenship. But, further, I will say to my good friend from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] that it took labor 40 years of hard fighting to get through that Norris-LaGuardia anti-injunction bill; and I was happy to be designated by Speaker Garner to preside in the chair during the consideration of that bill, and I was very happy to see it pass.

If the N.R.A. had done nothing else but abolish child labor and abolish the "yellow dog" contract, it would have been well worth its passage. [Applause.]

The passage of the N.R.A. has been a great forward step. It has set up principles that labor has fought for for a hundred years.

That the law has been badly administered in spots does not detract from the wonderful things that are possible under it when properly administered.

Properly administered, the N.R.A. can be made a new charter of liberty for the American workers and for industry.

I am not here to criticize the N.R.A. Above all, I am not here to criticize the President of the United States. I have repeatedly said at home and here that I think he is the greatest President we have had since Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.] I am not going to compare the Democratic administration with the Hoover administration, because there is no comparison. The American people know the answer to that without being told. I am asking, What have we done for labor now, in this session of Congress, with the terrible need for something to be done, with 10,000,000 people unemployment in the United States? Take the codes! We tried to fix it in the bill reported by the Committee on Labor this year. We tried to have labor representatives on the codes. That was in the Connery bill which we reported to the House this year—the 30-hour week bill. Where you have 15 men on code authorities under that bill there would be 5 employers, 5 labor employees, and 5 for the public, but you do not have that.

On your code authorities, with the exception of Sol Rosenblatt, on the amusement code, you have not a friend of labor. Look up and see who are on your code authorities. I am not blaming the President of the United States. On March 5 of this year the President, addressing a large assemblage of industrial leaders in Constitution Hall in Washington, asked industry to shorten hours and increase wages. It is now May 29, and less than one twenty-fifth of 1 percent of these industrialists have complied with the request of the President. Congress should act and do by legislation what industry refused to do for the President. The President has hundreds of problems to take care of, foreign and domestic, but I am blaming the administration of the N.R.A. Take the shoe industry. They put that on a 40-hour week. They have never worked 40 hours weekly in the history of the industry. All labor in that industry united to ask for a 30-hour week. They were refused. Then they asked for a reopening of the code to present their case. That was refused. I sent a telegram to Maj. George Berry, the administrator of that code, asking would he or would he not reopen that code. I have yet to receive an answer to my telegram sent weeks ago.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman says that he is not blaming the President, but he does say that he blames the administration of the N.R.A.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Is not the President responsible for the Administrator and the immediate personnel of the Administrator?

Mr. CONNERY. I suppose he is. I suppose the President appointed him; but when a law goes on the statute books, and this bill has been on the books for only a year, the President cannot be expected to know every detail of everything; he has to take the word many times of his subordinates that things are O.K., when they are not O.K., and he may have it in his mind for all we know to fire them all 2 weeks from now.

Mr. MOTT. But the President has not done it.

Mr. CONNERY. No. But I do know that that law has brought about wonderful things, which the President intended it should bring, as, for instance, the matter of the abolition of child labor, and the other things I have mentioned previously. There are weaknesses in the codes, and they can be fixed. These weaknesses would be eliminated if this Congress would pass the legislation which the Committee on Labor reported to the House, because you would have real labor men on every code, and they would soon tell the other code authorities what decent wages were, how many hours should be worked, and why.

Mr. MOTT. I voted last year to substitute this Black 30-hour bill for the hours provision of the N.R.A.

Mr. CONNERY. I thank my friend, and I still believe that ours was the better bill.

Mr. MOTT. I think we would have been a great deal further along if that had been substituted.

Mr. CONNERY. So do I; and in addition we would have saved the Government millions of dollars.

Mr. MOTT. Can the gentleman tell us what are the average hours of labor per day or per week under the code?

Mr. CONNERY. Forty hours a week.

Mr. MOTT. And if this bill—the Black 30-hour bill—is passed, what proportion of the unemployment will the 30-hour bill take up?

Mr. CONNERY. We figure that it would put 6,000,000 people to work.

Mr. MOTT. And how many are out of employment now?

Mr. CONNERY. Ten million; and that is why I favor unemployment insurance to provide for that other 4,000,000 who would still be unemployed even after we passed the 30-hour bill.

Mr. MOTT. I favor that. The only objection I have is the persistent assertion of Democrats that the President of the United States is not responsible for anything in this administration.

Mr. CONNERY. The President of the United States would have to be superhuman in order to read every code and say how many hours should be worked in each industry. He could not do it, together with silver problems, foreign problems, and stock exchange, banking, and farm problems, and what not. Why, no human being can do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The gentleman has referred to the city of Minneapolis two or three times. I understand the strike there is settled, and I understand the settlement is satisfactory to organized labor.

Mr. CONNERY. That is fine. And may I say here to my friend, Mr. JOHNSON, that my distinguished colleague, Mr. LUNDEEN, a member of our Labor Committee, has just informed me that no troops were called out in Minneapolis in the strike, as was done in Toledo. I congratulate the Governor of your State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. On top of that, I think we ought to give credit to the Farmer-Labor Governor, Governor Olson, for settling that strike. He worked night and day for nearly 10 days; and let me say one more thing, I think the Farmer-Laborites ought to be heard on this and other measures benefiting labor and the workingman.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. I gladly yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Because the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] is such a decent, splendid citizen, he has presented the decent side of strikes. What are you going to do with plants like Henry Ford's, where he has paid more than any other plant in the world as a minimum wage, and where the hours have been shorter than at other plants, and where the employees have been satisfied?

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. Are you going to force him to unionize?

Mr. CONNERY. I can only answer my friend by stating that all of his premises are wrong. Mr. Ford did not pay a decent wage, and his hours were not right, and his workers were never satisfied; and only last week he shifted all men who had dared to unionize to one plant and then fired that whole plant.

Mr. BLANTON. Our friend from Massachusetts has the respect and affection of all of his colleagues. The gentleman presents the decent side of strikes, with which everyone is agreed. But there is another side, where unions flagrantly violate the law and should not be upheld in it. The law should be respected both by capital and unions. What about the indecent side, where in Toledo the other day, by force of arms and brutality, unions, after beating him, stripped a young boy naked and marched him naked, beaten half to death, in front of their mob down the streets of the city as an example of what would happen to anyone who would oppose union mob strength and brutality? That is wrong. We must not uphold such lawlessness.

Mr. CONNERY. No one would favor that, of course.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman does not favor that?

Mr. CONNERY. No; and neither do I favor it when they shot down women in Pennsylvania in your Homestead strike, and shot down strikers in Pennsylvania with machine guns, and neither do I approve of what they did in Minneapolis, when they hit them on the heads with clubs, or when they stabbed the strikers with bayonets in Toledo.

Mr. BLANTON. We must stop this lawlessness and brutality on both sides.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that that was no worse than the shooting down in cold blood of 2 of the strikers by the National Guard and the bayoneting of 50 others. While the Governor of Minnesota may have been working day and night to correct the situation in Minneapolis, our Governor was up in Michigan fishing.

Mr. BLANTON. Two wrongs do not make a right. Labor wrong and capital wrong do not make a right.

Mr. TRUAX. No. But two men killed are worse than one man undressed. [Applause.]

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. I want to ask the gentleman what he proposes to do on the Black bill with reference to goods coming into this country from foreign countries which have no limitation on labor, as against the 30-hour week?

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman knows that during the last session there was a provision in the Connery bill——

Mr. GOSS. But it is not in the Black bill now.

Mr. CONNERY. No. In the Connery bill there was a provision which provided that any article arriving in the United States at total landed cost less than the cost of production of a similar article in the United States would be barred. In section 3E of the N.R.A. we have a provision which gives the President full power to declare an embargo, to tax them, or to do anything he sees fit to prevent interference with the administration of the N.R.A. due to foreign competition. He has already begun to use this power within the last few days in the case of Japanese goods.

Mr. GOSS. But that is on the 40-hour basis, according to the gentleman's own statement. What will it be when it becomes 30 hours?

Mr. CONNERY. The President has the same power.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman offer an amendment to the Black bill to include that, to make it mandatory?

Mr. CONNERY. No; because I want to see the Black bill passed, and fear that the issue would be clouded by such an amendment, since the President already has the power to take care of the situation under the N.I.R.A. I want to see the Black bill passed without any amendment, because I want to get on the 30-hour-week basis.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say in conclusion, I have told you as well as I could in my own way what I think we ought to do. I ask you if you believe in some of these things, to sign that petition, no. 30, up there. The farmers are for it. All labor, organized and unorganized, in every State in this Union is for that 30-hour week bill. You only have to check back in your own districts and you will find what I say is true.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman said there are 10,000,000 out of work. Does that include the 6,000,000 in the C.W.A.?

Mr. CONNERY. No. The C.W.A. has been demobilized.

Mr. KNUTSON. Then that makes 16,000,000?

Mr. CONNERY. There are 10,000,000 not working on anything—C.W.A. or anything else. Now, I ask the Membership to sign that petition, because the leading economists told us when they come before our committee that that would put 6,000,000 people to work. Further, it will give that much increased buying power to the people. The people with extra buying power can buy farm products; they can buy the products of industry and help us to get back to prosperity.

I shall not now go into this matter any further. There are hundreds of things I could tell you. In answer to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], I could tell you things I have seen with my own eyes, terrible things done to labor in strikes, but I am not trying to say that today. I am trying to cover in the limited time the legislative situation and to tell what I believe will happen if we do not pass this legislation. I hate strikes. I do not like to see men bayonetted. I do not like to see men die and see their little families left starving, with no pensions, and go to the poor rolls for relief. I do not like that. I do not want to see strikes; and because I hate strikes, because I want to see labor get its place in the sun and a real, decent United States of America to live in, I ask you, in the name of all these little children, in the name of the helpless aged, in the name of labor throughout the Nation, and for your own country, to sign that petition on the desk to pass that 30-hour-week bill and pass this other labor legislation before Congress adjourns. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include a statement presented by me to the Mississippi River Commission, which embraces a memorandum prepared by me for the President.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am asking the indulgence of the House again on this occasion to discuss a matter of importance and very great interest to the people whom I have the honor to represent. It is the subject of flood control, drainage, and river matters.

I have worked hard and been very active in these matters since my period of service in Congress began. I introduced a bill providing relief for the Tennessee side of the Mississippi River, and public hearings were held on this bill. I then succeeded in having the Flood Control Committee of the House include the west Tennessee area in its inspection trip through the Mississippi Valley. The administration then in control took a very strong position against this bill, which prevented favorable action on it. I have continued my activities on the matter during the present administration and am still exerting my best efforts to secure desired results. I assisted in securing some $3,000,000 for bank-protection work on the Tennessee side of the Mississippi River. I have conferred repeatedly with the Chairman of the Flood Control Committee during this session of Congress, from the very beginning of the session in January, with the view of having this area included in legislation considered and reported.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield to the Chairman of the Flood Control Committee.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the gentleman from Tennessee as a member of the Flood Control Committee was one of the most valuable members we ever had on this committee and his services then and ever since his election on the great Ways and Means Committee has been of very great assistance to us in connection with this matter. The gentleman has at all times been most active and diligent in protecting the interest of his people in Tennessee and they could not have a more able champion of their cause than he is. I would recall to him now that on account of these controversies, such as he has in mind in Tennessee and other places on the river, we secured an entire engineering review and reexamination of the entire flood-control project from Cade Girardeau to the Gulf. This review is now under way and the area in Tennessee in which he is so much interested will be given every consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman. I was just about to call attention to the resolution adopted during this session of Congress.

Mr. WILSON. I also suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that this review is now under way but is not yet complete and at the present time the Chief of Engineers states that he cannot make a report until he has completed the investigation of the entire problem with a determination to bring about an adjustment to solve the problem on a just and equitable basis to all concerned.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. I am sure we all concur in what the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON], Chairman of the Food Control Committee, has had to say with reference to the value of the services rendered by the gentleman from Tennessee, a former member of the Flood Control Committee, in starting the work to which the gentleman has alluded.

The gentleman from Tennessee is now, of course, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, one of the most powerful of all the committees of the House, having been elected to this committee by his Democratic colleagues. While the gentleman is no longer a member of the Flood Control Committee, his membership upon the Ways and Means Committee and the fact that he is also a member of the Committee on Committees has given him a power and influence in the House which makes him not only influential in matters relating to flood control but in all legislation that comes before the House. I think all the Members of the House will agree with me in the statement that the gentleman from Tennessee, by virtue of his position in the House and his ability and industry, has rendered a great service. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I thank my colleague.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I concur in everything the distinguished majority leader has said with reference to the value of the services rendered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER]. As a Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee, I may say that he is one of the most valuable Members on this committee as well as of the House. The gentleman's district is to be congratulated upon having a man of his attainments to represent it. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I thank my colleague.

During the early part of this session the following resolutions were passed by the Senate and the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to send to the House of Representatives (and the Senate) a comprehensive plan for the improvement and development of the rivers of the United States, with a view of giving to Congress information for its guidance in legislation which will provide for the maximum amount of flood control, navigation, irrigation, and development of hydroelectric power.

During this session of Congress General Markham, Chief of Engineers, appeared before the Flood Control Committee of the House and stated that the whole matter of flood-control legislation should be held up until the review and investigation being made under these resolutions could be completed.

As stated by the Chairman of the Flood Control Committee, who was the author of the resolution passed by the House, the purpose of this action by the Congress was to extend the comprehensive plan and national policy to all streams in every State in the Union. The President appointed a committee of Cabinet officers, as well as other committees, to assist in working out the plans, and the entire country has been divided into sections as follows: Atlantic coast, Gulf coast, West coast, east Mississippi, and west Mississippi.

I also call attention to the following statement made by the Chairman of the Flood Control Committee during a recent speech in the House on this subject. In speaking of the Flood Control Act of May 15, 1928, he stated that—

Amendments to this act are necessary to carry out the intent of Congress in respect to compensation for lands taken and used by the Government for the passage of flood waters in the main channel of the Mississippi River by new locations, set-backs, and changes in levee lines under the flood-control plan, lands or flowage rights over same embraced within spillways and floodways, and also areas adjacent to the main channel of the Mississippi River, the protection of which by levee construction is not deemed practical, when and wherever such lands are used or designed for use in the passage or storage of flood waters in the execution of the adopted project.

The alluvial valley of the Mississippi River, comprising 30,000 square miles, is now used for the passage and storage of the drainage and excess flood waters from 31 States, more than four-fifths of the entire area of the United States. The work now in progress will coordinate with whatever may be essential in the comprehensive plan. The work undertaken in the alluvial valley is an emergency project and should proceed as such.

Anyone familiar with the procedure here in subjects of this kind realizes the importance of favorably impressing the officials of the Government who have such an important part in such matters. I desire here to invite attention to a statement which I presented to the Mississippi River Commission at the hearing held at Memphis, Tenn., on May 2, 1934, during an inspection trip through the Mississippi Valley:

I appreciate the notice of this hearing and the opportunity to present this statement. I regret that on account of pressing matters of such great importance now pending in Congress which require me to remain at my post of duty in Washington that I am unable to be present at the hearing as I would like very much to be. I think I have attended all hearings on flood control and river matters, and have taken a very active interest in them since my period of service began. I have exerted every possible effort to present the problem and secure desired results for the people whom I have the honor to represent in connection with these important matters.

In a further effort to secure relief for the people along the east side of the river I arranged a conference with President Roosevelt in February of this year and Senator McKELLAR, Senator BACHMAN, and I went to the White House and conferred at considerable length with the President about flood control, flowage rights, drainage, and river matters. The President assured us that he would include our territory in the comprehensive study of this whole problem which he is making. He requested me to prepare and submit to him a memorandum on the subject of flowage rights for the area in Tennessee and Kentucky along the Mississippi River which I very gladly and promptly did. As this memorandum embraces my views on this subject and I think presents a fair statement of the situation, I am including it here, as I have secured permission from the White House to use it as a part of my statement at this hearing.

FLOWAGE RIGHTS FOR THE AREA IN TENNESSEE AND KENTUCKY ALONG THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER

Memorandum for the President.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Complying with your request during our recent conference, I am pleased to submit the following memorandum on the above subject:

There is situated along the east bank of the Mississippi River in the western part of the States of Tennessee and Kentucky an area of some 500,000 acres of land which is subject to floods and overflows from the Mississippi River. This is not wild or waste land. From one-third to one-half of it is in cultivation and improved, and much of it is among the finest land to be found anywhere in the Mississippi Valley. This area includes homes, farms, and improvements, many of which have existed for more than 100 years. These people have put their life's work and savings in the development and improvement of this property. They are exceedingly anxious to retain their homes and farms and to be able to enjoy them in the manner which existed prior to the time of the destructive floods which have been diverted upon them.

In the state of nature the land on the Tennessee and Kentucky side, or the east bank of the Mississippi River, is from 3 to 4 feet higher than the land on the west bank of the river. There is no levee system along the east bank of the river in this territory to protect this area. The construction and maintenance of the levee system across the river from this area has thrown this tremendous volume of water from the Mississippi River over on the Tennessee and Kentucky side, and has increased the flood heights from 6 to 7 feet in depth on these lands. While there was formerly a distance of some 30 or 40 miles from the river for this water to extend over the west side along this stretch of the river, the effect of the present levee system above, below, and across the river is to so restrict the river as to force these waters over all the area along the east bank. This levee system was connected up and made effective about 1896. The policy has been to raise and strengthen these levees since that time.

The Jadwin plan adopted under the Flood Control Act approved May 15, 1928, failed entirely to afford any relief or benefit to this area, but, on the contrary, it greatly aggravated the situation and increased the flood heights on these lands. The adopted project provides for the raising and strengthening of the levee system on the west side and gives no consideration whatever to the east side of the river. The New Madrid floodway is above this area and the entire volume of water is brought back into the main channel of the Mississippi River before it reaches this area. Naturally, this increased volume of water spreads over this area in Tennessee and Kentucky to the very great loss and damage to these people.

Prior to the adoption of this levee system the overflows were much more shallow and of very much shorter duration of time. It was practically unknown then for the people of this area to fail to make a crop on these lands. Since that time, and especially during recent years, they have either lost their crops entirely or they have been cut short to a very great extent. The loss of houses, barns, and other improvements has been very heavy. The water now remains on the land too late in the year for them to make a crop. The best they can hope for under existing conditions is not more than one-fourth of the crop formerly made by them. The situation is getting worse year after year and these people have sustained tremendous losses, and certainly it is through no fault of their own. A careful survey and estimate made by the Mississippi River Flood Control Association showed that during one flood this area sustained a property loss of some $6,000,000 and seven lives were lost.

The Federal Government has assumed responsibility for the existing levee system which is causing the injury and damage to this area in Tennessee and Kentucky along the Mississippi River. The Government engineers reported that it is not feasible to protect this area by levee. The practical effect of the existing situation is that this area is dedicated and used as a storage basin along the main stem of the Mississippi River. It is, therefore, most respectfully urged that the people of this area who are suffering such great losses and damage in the manner herein indicated should receive fair and adequate consideration from the Government. These people who are of the very highest and finest type of citizenship feel most keenly that they should be paid for annual flowage rights on their land by the Government. The amount of which to be fixed by proper agency with their being given full and ample opportunity to be heard and present proof. While these people most strongly favor and prefer this method of treatment, they also feel that in the event this method is not approved that the Government should acquire permanent flowage rights.

It is earnestly requested that due consideration be given to this area in Tennessee and Kentucky in the comprehensive plan to be submitted to the Congress under the provisions of resolutions recently adopted by the Senate and the House, and that the method of treatment embraced herein be recommended therein. In case it is found that it will take some time to work out and put into effect a comprehensive plan it is felt that this relief through flowage rights for this area should be provided now.

It is the purpose in this memorandum to submit as brief and concise a statement of the situation as possible, and any further data or information on the subject will be gladly furnished.

Respectfully submitted.

JERE COOPER,
Member of Congress from Tennessee.

As indicated by this statement, I desire to very strongly urge that this area be included in your inspection and consideration of this problem and that the relief herein requested be included in your report and recommendation.

Respectfully submitted.

JERE COOPER,
Member of Congress from Tennessee.

In the early part of this year I secured the passage of resolutions by the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House for the review of reports and investigation of the Obion, Forked Deer, and Hatchie Rivers in Tennessee, with the view of improving these streams.

DRAINAGE DISTRICTS

I want to also call attention to the matter of drainage districts, which is of great importance to our people. I was gratified when we finally succeeded in getting the provision in the Agricultural Adjustment Act to refinance drainage districts through the R.F.C., and had $50,000,000 set aside for that purpose. Since none of the districts have taken advantage of the plan, I am convinced that its provisions are not generally known by those affected. It is also true that certain additional legislation has been enacted at this session of Congress which will further enable the people to take advantage of the benefits provided for these districts. We have also just passed a measure providing for loans from the R.F.C. to small industries, and there is included in this measure a provision which increases the amount of the funds to refinance drainage districts and similar purposes from $50,000,000 to $125,000,000.

Circular no. 7 has been issued describing the course to be followed in reorganization to reduce and refinance these drainage districts, and I hope the landowners will acquaint themselves with its terms. Briefly, it provides for reorganization of a district, the purchase by the R.F.C. of the outstanding bonds at market value, the issuance of refunding bonds based on the purchase price of the originals, allowance of 40 years to pay the new assessment at the small interest charge provided under section 5 of the R.F.C. act. This gives the landowner the direct benefit of a reduction of his basic assessment in the amount of the depreciation of the district bonds. This in most cases will be a large percentage of what remains, as the bonds are being offered for exceedingly low figures. Based on this small assessment, and amortized over the 40-year period, owners of drainage land can develop it without the destructive demands in taxes they have now hanging over them.

I have considered this as a fair method of relief. I advocated it from the beginning of my congressional services, and appeared before the committee considering the plan to especially urge that the farmer be given the advantage of any depreciation of the bonds, to make it his bill instead of the bondholders' bill. I have been very active in securing the passage of this legislation in the interest of our farmers and landowners.

I understand other methods of relief are being suggested that call for full governmental assumption of all drainage charges. It is a serious thing to call on the man owning the hillside farm to pay for drainage developments in the bottom area. These were undertaken as private projects; and while I realize and deeply regret the disastrous results to landowners in many instances, yet I doubt if these people would want to fasten the cost of any mistake that was made in this respect directly on their neighbors and call on them to pay the bill. I am inclined to believe that the method of treatment by the Federal Government, through legislation enacted by Congress, for which I voted and worked, is fair and reasonable and gives a proper degree of equal treatment of all of our people.

The present administration has provided substantial relief for our people on the drainage question and still further benefits will be afforded. Our great President is working on the comprehensive plan for further relief on flood-control and river matters. He is applying his splendid talents along with his able assistants to these questions. I feel confident that he will meet and solve this great problem in the interest of the people of this country in the same splendid manner in which he has solved all other problems to which he has applied his great ability and efforts. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order of the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 10 minutes at this time.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the House to Senate Resolution 83, which was passed in 1928. It was under this resolution that the investigation now being conducted by the Federal Trade Commission has been pursued.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include at this point a copy of this resolution as it passed the Senate. It is a short resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The resolution is as follows:

[S.Res. 83, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

Report No. 225

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

December 17, 1927.

Mr. Walsh, of Montana, submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to lie over under the rule.

December 19, 1927, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce February 1 (calendar day, Feb. 2), 1928, reported by Mr. Watson with amendments.

February 6, 1928, referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

February 9, 1928, reported by Mr. Deneen with an additional amendment.

February 13 (calendar day, Feb. 15), 1928, considered, modified, and agreed to.

Resolution

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inquire into and report to the Senate, by filing with the Secretary thereof, within each 30 days after the passage of this resolution and finally on the completion of the investigation (any such inquiry before the Commission to be open to the public and due notice of the time and place of all hearings to be given by the Commission, and the stenographic report of the evidence taken by the Commission to accompany the partial and final reports) upon (1) the growth of the capital assets and capital liabilities of public-utility corporations doing an interstate or international business supplying either electrical energy in the form of power or light, or both, however produced, or gas, natural or artificial, of corporations holding the stock of two or more public-utility corporations operating in different States, and of non-public-utility corporations owned or controlled by such holding companies; (2) the method of issuing, the price realized or value received, the commissions or bonuses paid or received, and other pertinent facts with respect to the various security issues of all classes of corporations herein named, including the bonds and other evidences of indebtedness thereof, as well as the stocks of the same; (3) the extent to which such holding companies or their stockholders control or are financially interested in financial, engineering, construction, and/or management corporations, and the relation, one to the other, of the classes of corporations last named the holding companies, and the public-utility corporations; (4) the services furnished to such public-utility corporations by such holding companies and/or subsidiary companies, the fees, commissions, bonuses, or other charges made therefor, and the earnings and expenses of such holding companies and their associated, affiliated, and/or subsidiary companies; and (5) the value or detriment to the public of such holding companies owning the stock or otherwise controlling such public-utility corporations immediately or remotely, with the extent of such ownership or control, and particularly what legislation, if any, should be enacted by Congress to correct any abuses that may exist in the organization or operation of such holding companies.

The Commission is further empowered to inquire and report whether, and to what extent, such corporations, or any of the officers thereof, or anyone in their behalf or in behalf of any organization of which any such corporation may be a member, through the expenditure of money or through the control of the avenues of publicity, have made any, and what, effort to influence or control public opinion on account of municipal or public ownership of the means by which power is developed and electrical energy is generated and distributed, or since 1923 to influence or control elections: Provided, That the elections herein referred to shall be limited to the elections of President, Vice President, and Members of the United States Senate.

The Commission is hereby further directed to report particularly whether any of the practices heretofore in this resolution stated tend to create a monopoly or constitute violation of the Federal antitrust laws.

Mr. SIROVICH. By whom was this resolution introduced?

Mr. McFADDEN. It was introduced by the late Senator Walsh, of Montana.

I may say in this connection that Senator Walsh had great difficulty in getting this resolution passed. He was sidetracked from his original intention that the Senate should appoint a special committee to carry on this investigation. This investigation was fought by the Power Trust and by the public-utility interests, and Senator Walsh had to accept the final edict transferring this investigation to the Federal Trade Commission. From time to time the Federal Trade Commission has made its report as its investigators reported the completion of their examinations in accordance with the resolution.

I direct particular attention at this time to that part of their investigation to which I have heretofore referred, namely, the investigation of Henry L. Doherty and his corporations, known as the Cities Service Co., and other subsidiaries, because of the disclosures which the Federal Trade Commission have uncovered in regard to the exploitation of the American investing public through which hundreds of millions of dollars have been taken fraudulently from the people by this gentleman and his companies. Proof of the statements which I have made previously on the floor of this House is now available to a great extent by the disclosures which are being made before the Federal Trade Commission at the present time. I want to call attention, however, to the fact that this report has been greatly delayed.

The tables in this report are of particular importance not only to the Members of the House, but to the Congress and to the people of the United States. A most unusual procedure has taken place in regard to the final analysis and report of the Federal Trade Commission in connection with the Cities Service group. In this connection I direct attention to that which took place when the Darrow report on the N.R.A. was made to the President of the United States a few weeks ago. Apparently, because that report did not meet the approval of the President and the administration, it was held up for a period of 2 weeks until those in authority in the administration of the N.R.A. could examine it, so that simultaneously with the publication of the Darrow report the analysis of the administration could also be put out and to that extent smother the effect of the report of the Darrow committee.

The same thing is apparently taking place as regards the reports of the Federal Trade Commission, and again we find the administration interfering in the manner in which this report of the Federal Trade Commission on H. L. Doherty's companies is to be made. How do we notice this? For a number of years the Federal Trade Commission has had a department of publicity and propaganda. This department was headed by a very capable man, Mr. Mayer. Mr. Mayer has now been superseded by a Mr. Baker, apparently a trusted man of the administration. So, now, under the direction of Mr. Baker, when the publicity, incident to the publishing of the reports by the Federal Trade Commission of Mr. Doherty and his companies, particularly Cities Service, is released and made public under the authority of the Federal Trade Commission, Mr. Baker puts out a mimeographed report—this has not been the practice heretofore—which is available to the press and the public, and to Mr. Doherty's attorneys and publicity agent, who simultaneously put out their version of whatever disclosures are made, so that the public has Doherty's answer simultaneously with the Federal Trade Commission's disclosures—the same trick that was played in the release of the Darrow report on N.R.A.

I can understand why the President and the administration have been concerned and interested in these criticisms of H. L. Doherty and his companies by the Federal Trade Commission, owing to the fact that Mr. Doherty was chairman of the President's birthday parties which raised a million dollars, and he presented this to the President at the White House for one of the President's pet projects, the Warm Springs Foundation. The public have been interested in Mr. Doherty's maneuvers to gain the good graces of the President and the administration through this birthday party activity, and the other entertainment features which Mr. Doherty has so lavishly given to the President and the administration, as likewise the public were interested to note another of Mr. Doherty's attempts to popularize himself with the administration through the assistance, both physical and financial, which he contributed to the embassy abroad over which Mrs. Ruth Bryan Owen presides. The public are watching, particularly that part of the public who have lost millions of dollars through the fraudulent financial manipulations of Henry L. Doherty and his companies, as to just what Mr. Doherty has accomplished in the way of securing the protection of the President and the administration so that Mr. Doherty and his companies may be kept free from any possible prosecution by this Government.

Because of the closeness of Henry L. Doherty to this administration and the things he has been doing for the President of the United States, I charge that the President of the United States and this administration are attempting through their edicts to cover up and protect Henry L. Doherty and his companies, who are now under investigation by the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the President is deliberately undertaking to cover up Henry L. Doherty?

Mr. McFADDEN. I may say to the gentleman that that is the net result of the action he has taken in reference to the Federal Trade Commission. Does the gentleman desire proof of this?

Mr. COX. The gentleman will make his own speech. I think if he makes such charges he ought to sustain them.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will be very glad to sustain them.

I have here an order dated May 14, 1934: "Memorandum for chief counsel, chief economist and mails and files section, Federal Trade Commission; Senate Resolution 83, public utilities investigation, Seventieth Congress, first session, February 15, 1928." I call the attention of the Members of the House particularly to this order issued by the secretary, Mr. Otis B. Johnson, of the Federal Trade Commission:

> The Commission today directed that the chief counsel and the chief economist instruct their staff that in connection with the completion of the report on utilities as planned in accordance with the President's letter of April 26, 1934, they are not to initiate any new investigations either into utility finances or propaganda phases of the inquiry.

It would be interesting, I may say to the gentleman from Georgia, if he would read this letter of the President of April 26, 1934, which resulted in the order of the Commission to stop its investigation, or its further inquiry, if you please, into the manipulations of Henry L. Doherty and his public-utility operations or of the Associated Gas & Electric Co. in regard to their negotiations, and all other investigation of public utilities under the Walsh resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am sorry; I cannot yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. No; I am sorry, but I cannot yield.

I call attention to the fact that this investigation of the public utilities is one of the most important things that is before the public at the present time. It was instigated by the late Senator Walsh of Montana, a leading Democrat, and I say that this report indicates that the authority vested in this Commission is being interfered with and that the investigation under such interference cannot proceed in accordance with the Walsh resolution.

By what authority, I ask, has any President the right to direct any investigation that has been authorized by the Congress?

The carrying out of the investigation provided for under Senate Resolution 83 was the crowning achievement of the late Senator Walsh, and I know, as every Member of this Congress knows, of the deep interest of this great Senator in this investigation. I also happen to know that it was one of his purposes, had he been permitted to serve as Attorney General of the United States, to watch closely the uncovering of the operations of dishonest exploiters and financiers who operated in public utilities and to properly prosecute and stop these fraudulent practices.

This administration came into power with definite promises of correction of this and other monetary and fiscal manipulations. This interference by the President with orderly procedure in this investigation indicates what might have taken place had the supervision of the operations of the New York Stock Exchange, which is now under consideration in the Congress, been left to the Federal Trade Commission.

I have been trying all this session and last session to get the Rules Committee of this House to pass out my resolution proposing to investigate one phase of this public-utility scandal of Henry L. Doherty and his companies. It is apparent now that inasmuch as the Rules Committee of this House is so completely dominated by the administration in their efforts to protect Henry L. Doherty and his companies that I could not get even a hearing on the bill. This investigation would have disclosed to the administration of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the Federal Trade Commission, and the public the men in the Bureau of Internal Revenue who were protecting outfits like the Doherty group.

In the several speeches that I have made on the floor of the House I have from time to time pointed out the fraudulent practices of Henry L. Doherty and his companies. He organized a Delaware corporation known as "Henry L. Doherty & Co., Inc." This company was created for the distinct purpose of defrauding the Government.

In the course of the presentation for the record by the Federal Trade Commission of the report on Cities Service Co. under Senate Resolution 83, at the opening of the hearing there were handed out mimeographed copies of a summary of volume 1 of the Report on Cities Service Co., put out by the Federal Trade Commission, and typewritten copies of answers thereto put out by representatives of the company.

The mimeograph copy of the summary of volume 1 of Cities Service Co.'s report show that—

First. As of December 31, 1930, the closing date of the report, Henry L. Doherty owned 29.6 percent of the voting control of Cities Service Co.

Second. Only two other stockholders owned as much as 1 percent of the voting control.

Third. By such 29.6-percent stock ownership Mr. Doherty controlled as a one-man institution Cities Service Co. and all of its subsidiaries, affiliates, and associates, and dictated every policy of the management, control, and financing of the whole group.

Fourth. As at this date, December 31, 1930, there appeared on the books of Cities Service Co. and its subsidiaries over $246,000,000 in write-ups—$246,000,000 of that represented not one cent of real value, but was all water that had been poured into the company upon which the security investors, without knowing the true facts, had invested in the stocks of these securities as offered on the market, and on the basis of which inflated values it will be shown that Mr. Henry L. Doherty unloaded over $19,000,000 of the securities that had been held by him at a price ranging above $50 a share on stock that is now quoted on the curb—which quotations are shown to have been maintained by a rigged market that was kept up by manipulations of this man Doherty—at a price of $2.50 to $2.62½ cents, and which stock at the time he sold it he well knew had no such value as that at which he sold it, and that this price was one that had been maintained by him by manipulating the market, all of which was done directly in fraud of the rights of the stockholders whom he represented in a fiduciary capacity and the public on whom he was unloading; and $246,000,000 of water and air upon which the ratepayers using the commodities—electricity, gas, oil, and so forth—must pay a premium. This is the type of transaction, a fraud upon the public, that the President is protecting.

Fifth. Concurrently with the write-ups of the plant and investment accounts of subsidiaries and largely as a result of them, Cities Service Co. recovered in excess of $100,000,000 in cash of its initial investment in companies and properties which were consolidated and merged or transferred from one company to another within the system. This $100,000,000 represents the contribution of the companies that were so treated toward the acquisition of other companies by this reckless, greedy manipulator and defrauder of the public and the ratepayers using these commodities, an amount out of which the prior holders of securities in these companies were mulcted in order that this financial buccaneer might personally fatten at the public's expense and parade the country as a great benefactor. (Instead of the President protecting, as he is doing, this fraud as perpetrated upon the investing public, it should be in the hands of the Attorney General for prosecution. The evidence is in the Lundvall report, now in the possession of the Federal Trade Commission.)

Sixth. For the most part, these consolidations and mergers resulted in an increase in securities issued, with consequent write-ups in plant and investments; a refinancing of companies, resulting in a greater proportion of outstanding senior securities—securities that were palmed off on the public by this man Doherty—and a smaller proportion of common stock after the merger than before, all of which permitted him to exercise the same degree of control over these properties with a smaller investment and in some instances without any investment at all.

Seventh. These inflations appear both on the books of the subsidiary companies and on the books of Cities Service Co. In other words, the value of plant and investment accounts of the subsidiary companies and of the parent company, Cities Service Co., were both inflated by this amount, and the value of the securities offered to the public in these companies were deflated or reduced by this amount.

Eighth. Over $35,000,000 of this amount represented intercompany profits to Cities Service Co. in transferring securities or properties to subsidiaries, capitalized preferred and common-stock discounts incurred in the issuance of stocks, the capitalization of the par value with common stocks issued as a bonus with the sale of its preferred stocks, the capitalization of depreciated reserves of its subsidiaries which had been capitalized in reorganization by the merged company, the capitalization of earnings of subsidiaries in reorganizations in excess of the actual earnings accrued, the erroneous capitalization of surpluses of acquired companies, the erroneous capitalization of losses incurred by subsidiaries, and write-ups in value investment, which were reflected principally in an overstatement of its surplus accounts by $11,000,000, an overstatement in its premium and discount on capital-stock account, or paid-in surplus of over $10,000,000, and the creation of surplus from revaluation of assets amounting to over $8,000,000, a total of $30,000,000. This means, according to the perverted theory of this man Doherty, the manipulator, a surplus of over $35,000,000 of thin air available for dividends.

How much of this sum out of these reserves and fictitious surplus were used for the payment of dividends? I am informed this will be shown in volume 2 of the report on Cities Service, which will not be presented for the record until after Congress adjourns. You gentlemen can interpret the significance of that for yourselves. There is not a man on this floor whose constituents have not been sold the stocks of these companies on the theory that the asset values behind them were far in excess of the real values shown by the books of the companies. These are matters that you must answer to your constituents for. They are matters which I have been trying to bring to light and which I have used every means to have the Bureau of Internal Revenue make available to this Congress so that you might be able to intelligently present the whole crooked situation to the people of the country.

Ninth. There is a more presently pressing serious situation involved in this affair than is disclosed by the mimeographed statement put out by the Federal Trade Commission, and one that concerns every taxpayer in this country, whether he be of my constituency or of your constituency—a matter that is susceptible of correction and cure, a matter that is within the jurisdiction of this body, a matter to which I have heretofore pointed a way for the development, correction, and cure. I refer to the evasion of the income tax by the fraudulent deceptions practiced not only by this taxpayer but by innumerable other taxpayers whose income-tax returns are or can be made available to this body at any time they see fit to exercise their jurisdiction.

I have heretofore presented to this body for its consideration and have asked you to adopt a resolution for an investigation of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. If such a resolution is approved by this body and a committee is appointed, I pledge you that the whole matter can be adjusted without cost, or with very little cost, to the Government within 60 days and the whole matter can be laid before the Secretary of the Treasury and the President for their action without any public exposures or reflection upon any innocent person in the service or person or corporation taxpayer. This can be done under jurisdiction of a committee of three or five persons who can command assistance of persons already employed by the Government who can be transferred from the Bureau of Internal Revenue or the Joint Committee of Congress for this purpose. Among other cases than that of Henry L. Doherty it will be shown that every sort of device has been conceived and put forward and every sort of practice has been indulged in both by representatives of the Government in the Internal Revenue Bureau and by taxpayers to defraud the Government out of the taxes justly due it.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of such business as may be upon the Speaker's desk, I may be permitted to address the House for 3 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, as I stated earlier in the afternoon, we have a very comprehensive and a very pressing program for tomorrow and several days thereafter. For the present I will have to object to any request that interferes with our program tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, in the summer of 1933, when to question an act of the administration was like questioning the Deity, an Executive order was ordered pertaining to postmasters. Through clever propaganda, that order was held out to the people as one which took postmasters out of politics. Naturally, the great majority of the people could only read the publicity propaganda pertaining to the order and had no opportunity to read the order itself. Even Will Rogers took the propaganda "hook, line, and sinker." He said:

This man Roosevelt seems to think that a postmaster should know how to read and write.

It would still be the signal to start the smearing brigade if a Republican spoke the mere truth pertaining to this order. Here is what the annual report of the nonpartisan National Civil Service Reform League says of this order:

It is a sham and a mere cloak for the spoils system.

This same report brands the postal civil-service examinations as—a disgrace to the Roosevelt administration and a serious liability to the United States Civil Service Commission.

The league in its report states that President Roosevelt should either modify his order so that examinations for postmasters are free and open or else—frankly return to selecting postmasters on an undisguised spoils basis, thus relieving the Civil Service Commission of the odious and useless task that has been put upon it.

This annual report of the Civil Service Reform League, speaking of the general return of the spoils system, said:

Ordinary Government services have been cut and employees in the departments furloughed, laid off, or dismissed. Spoils raids have been made under the guise of economy, yet, at the same time a score of new agencies have been created and have employed without regard to the civil service law nearly 60,000 persons at an annual cost of $75,000,000.

Speaking further, the league in its report said:

The tremendous responsibilities which the new deal has placed upon the Government are too heavy for the handling by amateurs, whose greatest qualification is that they were for Roosevelt before Chicago.

These words would be unpardonable political words if they came from a Republican, but coming from the Civil Service Reform League, they must be accepted as the truth, which they are.

This report of the league criticizes the shameful conduct of this Congress in writing into all new legislation that the provisions of the civil service law shall not apply.

This report of the league further points out the spoils raid in the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. The report refers to this Corporation not as a haven for distressed home owners but as "the politicians' happy hunting ground." The report makes clear that turning the Home Owners' Loan Corporation over to spoilsmen has not only been an injustice to nonpartisan merit men and women but also most costly to the distressed home owners. The report sets forth the record of these spoilsmen in the meeting of their responsibility to save homes from foreclosures. The report gives the following startling disclosures:

In Illinois, up to March 15 of this year, out of 63,877 applications, 1,048 loans were closed by 422 employees; in New York out of 68,172 applications, 3,128 loans were closed by 760 employees; and in California employees were forced to contribute 5 percent of their salaries for the Democratic campaign fund.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS. May I inquire of the gentleman if he voted for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law which passed under the previous administration?

Mr. McGUGIN. I did not.

Mr. BYRNS. And may I inquire if that law did not put the employees under the civil service. It was due to the gentlemen's party that it was passed in that manner.

Mr. McGUGIN. The R.F.C. became a law under the leadership of the gentleman's party as well as mine.

Mr. BYRNS. It was signed by your President.

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes; but my party was not in control. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] put the bill through the House.

Thus we find from the report of the Civil Service Reform League that the post offices have not only drifted back further into the mire of spoilsmanship, but to hide the inequity from the people, by Executive order, the Civil Service Commission has been made a fraud and a sham, that 60,000 new spoilsmen have been added to the public pay roll to bleed the taxpayers of America.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, we have spent most of the day in speeches here.

Mr. SNELL. The majority of the time has been taken up by the Members on that side of the House. Why not give the gentleman from Kansas 2 minutes more?

Mr. BYRNS. It makes no difference whether it is on this side or on that side.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. I object.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object if the gentleman wants 2 additional minutes, but I am going to object to further requests to make speeches this afternoon or tomorrow.

Mr. MILLARD. I have asked unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 2 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, let me say to my friend from New York that we have an agreement to take up the Private Calendar this evening, and we will have to have a quorum here to take a recess. The gentleman is simply compelling the Members to come from their offices at this hour in the afternoon in order that we may take a recess until tonight.

Mr. SNELL. Why not let the gentleman from Kansas have 2 minutes?

Mr. BYRNS. I am not objecting to that, but the gentleman from New York is making a point of no quorum.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. They are not Democrats replacing Republicans. They come from but one faction of the Democratic Party. They are Farley men replacing merit men and women. That is not only an injustice practiced against Republicans, Socialists, and Independents, but also against the great majority of Democrats. The average Democrat, his son or his daughter, would have a better chance of obtaining employment under a civil-service merit system than under the spoils system. The merit system would not have placed some 8 or 10 members of Secretary of Commerce Roper's family on the public pay roll. The spoils system has so cared for the Roper family. Throughout the executive department, the families of executive heads have been given preferential appointments. This could not be under a system of merit. It is as iniquitous for nepotism to be practiced in the executive department as it is for nepotism to be practiced in the legislative branch.

This annual report of the Civil Service Reform League presents the undisputable evidence that this administration has returned this country to the spoils system of 50 years ago. Further, that this return to the spoils system robs the taxpayers, denies public employment to the meritorious, and does irreparable wrong to those who have business with the Government, such as the applicants for farm and home loans. The intolerable delay in the payment of benefits under allotment contracts to the farmer is doubtless due largely to incompetent spoilsmen and visionary bureaucrats in the Department of Agriculture. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—DIVISION OF TERRITORIES AND ISLAND POSSESSIONS IN THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR (H.DOC. NO. 390)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered printed:

Mr. McKEOWN submitted the following conference report on the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto:

CONFERENCE REPORT

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 29, 32, and 34, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the Senate amendment numbered 1 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "whether filed before or after this section becomes effective, provided the present operations of such corporation do not exclude it hereunder, and whether or not the corporation has been adjudicated a bankrupt"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the Senate amendment numbered 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "or in any territorial jurisdiction in the State in which it was incorporated. The court shall upon petition transfer such proceedings to the territorial jurisdiction where the interests of all the parties will be best subserved"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the Senate amendment numbered 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"In case an executory contract or unexpired lease of real estate shall be rejected pursuant to direction of the judge given in a proceeding instituted under this section, or shall have been rejected by a trustee or receiver in bankruptcy or receiver in equity, in a proceeding pending prior to the institution of a proceeding under this section any person injured by such rejection shall, for all purposes of this section and of the reorganization plan, its acceptance and confirmation, be deemed to be a creditor. The claim of a landlord for injury resulting from the rejection of an unexpired lease of real estate or for damages or indemnity under a covenant contained in such lease shall be treated as a claim ranking on a parity with debts which would be provable under section 63 (a) of this act, but shall be limited to an amount not to exceed the rent, without acceleration, reserved by said lease for the 3 years next succeeding the date of surrender of the premises to the landlord or the date of reentry of the landlord, whichever first occurs, whether before or after the filing of the petition, plus unpaid rent accrued up to such date of surrender or reentry: Provided, That the court shall scrutinize the circumstances of an assignment of future rent claims and the amount of the consideration paid for such assignment in determining the amount of damages allowed assignee hereunder."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 10, line 23, of the House engrossed copy of the bill, after the word "committee", insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That the judge shall scrutinize and may disregard any limitations or provisions of any depositary agreements, trust indentures, committee or other authorizations affecting any creditor acting under this section and may enforce an accounting thereunder or restrain the exercise of any power which he finds to be unfair or not consistent with public policy and may limit any claims filed by such committee member or agent, to the actual consideration paid therefor"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the Senate amendment strike out the period and insert a colon and the following: "Provided, however, That such personal representative shall first obtain the consent and authority of the court which has assumed jurisdiction of said estate, to invoke the relief provided by said act of March 3, 1933. The first sentence of subdivision (m) of said section 74 is amended to read as follows: 'The filing of a debtor's petition or answer seeking relief under this section shall subject the debtor and his property, wherever located, to the exclusive jurisdiction of the court in which the order approving the petition or answer as provided in subdivision (a) is filed, and this shall include property of the debtor in the possession of a trustee under a trust deed or a mortgage, or a receiver, custodian or other officer of any court in a pending cause, irrespective of the date of appointment of such receiver or other officer, or the date of the institution of such proceedings: Provided, That it shall not affect any proceeding in any court in which a final decree has been entered'"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the Senate amendment numbered 28 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 3. In the administration of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', approved July 1, 1898, as amended, the district court or any judge thereof shall, in its or his discretion, so apportion appointments of receivers and trustees among persons, firms, or corporations, or attorneys therefor, within the district, eligible thereto, as to prevent any person, firm, or corporation from having a monopoly of such appointments within such district. No person shall be appointed as a receiver or trustee who is a near relative of the judge of the court making such appointment. The compensation allowed a receiver or trustee or an attorney for a receiver or trustee shall in no case be excessive or exhorbitant, and the court in fixing such compensation shall have in mind the conservation and preservation of the estate of the bankrupt and the interest of the creditors therein."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the Senate amendment numbered 30 and insert in lieu thereof the following: " but the claim of a landlord for injury resulting from the rejection by the trustee of an unexpired lease of real estate or for damages or indemnity under a covenant contained in such lease shall in no event be allowed in an amount exceeding the rent reserved by the lease, without acceleration, for the year next succeeding the date of the surrender of the premises plus an amount equal to the unpaid rent accrued up to said date: Provided, That the court shall scrutinize the circumstances of an assignment of future rent claims and the amount of the consideration paid for such assignment in determining the amount of damages allowed assignee hereunder: Provided further, That the provisions of this clause (7) shall apply to estates pending at the time of the enactment of this amendatory act "; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the Senate amendment numbered 31 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

" SEC. 7. Proceedings under section 77 of chapter 8, amendment to the act of July 1, 1898, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', as amended, approved March 3, 1933, shall not be grounds for the removal of any cause of action to the United States district court which was not removable before the passage and approval of this section, and any cause of action heretofore removed from a State court on account of this section shall be remanded to the court from which it was removed, and such order of removal vacated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the Senate amendment numbered 33 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

" SEC. 9. That the second sentence of subdivision (b) of section 75 of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', as amended, is amended to read as follows: 'The conciliation commissioner shall receive as compensation for his services, including all expenses, a fee of $25 for each case docketed and submitted to him, to be paid out of the Treasury.' "

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H.R. 5884) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The following Senate amendments, to which the House agreed, are formal and merely improve the language of the bill: Amendments 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24.

On amendment no. 1: Amendment no. 1, as agreed upon by the conferees, makes it possible for a corporation in bankruptcy, either before or after this section becomes effective, to proceed to reorganize under this section.

On amendment no. 3: The House bill provided that proceedings under this section should be initiated before the court in whose territorial jurisdiction the corporation during the preceding 6 months had had its principal place of business or its principal assets. The Senate amendment provided that in case of controversy as to the principal place of business or the place where the principal assets are located, then the petition could be filed in the territorial jurisdiction in which the corporation was incorporated, provided that the court could transfer the proceedings to any jurisdiction where the corporation had a substantial portion of its assets if satisfied that the interests of all parties would be better subserved thereby.

The amendment, as agreed upon by the conferees, retains jurisdiction as provided in the House bill and also provides that the petition may be filed in any territorial jurisdiction in the State in which the corporation was incorporated. The court, however, is directed upon petition to transfer such proceedings to the territorial jurisdiction where the interests of all the parties will be best subserved.

On amendment no. 5: The Senate amendment, to which the House agreed, makes it unnecessary to show that the corporation has committed an act of bankruptcy within 4 months in case a prior proceeding in bankruptcy or an equity receivership is pending at the time proceedings under the reorganization section are initiated.

On amendment no. 13: Amendment no. 14, as agreed upon by the conferees, makes unnecessary the language which amendment 13 strikes out. The House therefore receded.

On amendment no. 14: Under the House bill, executory contracts, including claims for future rent, are made provable claims for the purposes of this section. The Senate amendment limited claims for future rent to an amount equal to the rent reserved by the lease for 1 year.

The amendment agreed to by conference makes any person injured by the rejection of an executory contract or unexpired lease of real estate a creditor for the purposes of this section. The claim of the landlord for injury resulting from loss of future rents is limited to an amount not to exceed the rent reserved by the lease for 3 years next succeeding the date of surrender of the premises or the date of reentry of the landlord, whichever first occurs, plus unpaid rent accrued up to such date of surrender or reentry of the landlord. The court is directed to scrutinize the circumstances of an assignment of future rent claims and the amount of the consideration paid for such assignment in determining the amount of damages to be allowed such assignee.

On amendment no. 15: The Senate amendment provides for the purposes of this section a creditor may act by an attorney at law as well as in person, or by duly authorized agent or committee. The House, by the conference amendment, agreed to the Senate amendment providing that a creditor may act by an attorney at law, and also provided that the judge shall scrutinize and may disregard any limitations or provisions of depository agreements which may limit any claims filed by a committee member or agent to the actual consideration which such committee member paid therefor.

On amendment no. 16: This Senate amendment, to which the House agreed, tolls the running of the statutes of limitations during the pendency of proceedings under this section.

On amendment no. 25: The House bill provides that the judge may require the trustee or trustees, or if there be no trustee, the debtor, to make any transfer or conveyance necessary to effectuate the plan of reorganization after confirmation.

The Senate amendment, to which the House agreed, includes as parties whom the court may require to make such transfers or conveyances, any mortgagee, the trustee of any obligation of the debtor, and all other proper and necessary parties.

On amendment no. 27: The Senate amendment amends the section of the Bankruptcy Act dealing with individual debtors which was added to the act by the amendment of March 3, 1933. It provides that such section shall include the personal representative of a deceased individual for the purpose of effecting a settlement or composition with the creditors of the estate.

The conferees agreed to the Senate amendment with the addition of the proviso that such personal representative shall first obtain the consent and authority of the court which has assumed the jurisdiction of said estate. Also the provision is added that the filing of a debtor's petition or answer seeking relief under section 74 shall subject the debtor and his property wherever located to the jurisdiction of the court and that this shall include property in possession of a trustee or receiver irrespective of the date of appointment of such receiver or other officer, provided that this amendment shall not affect any proceeding in any court in which a final decree has been entered.

On amendment no. 28: This amendment has to do with the prevention of monopolies of receiverships, trusteeships, and appointments as attorney for receiver in any district.

The amendment agreed to by the conferees provides that "the district court or any judge thereof shall in its or his discretion so apportion appointments of receivers and trustees among persons, firms, or corporations, or attorneys therefor, within the district eligible thereto as to prevent any person, firm, or corporation from having a monopoly of such appointments within such district." The appointment of a person as a receiver or trustee who is a near relative of the judge making the appointment is prohibited.

The further provision is made that the compensation allowed the receiver or trustee or his attorney shall in no case be excessive or exorbitant and the court is directed in fixing such compensation to have in mind the conservation and the preservation of the estate of the bankrupt and the interests of the creditors therein.

On amendment no. 29: Senate amendment 29 makes judgments for negligence provable claims in bankruptcy. The House agreed to the amendment.

On amendment no. 30: This amendment has to do with claims for future rent under the general bankruptcy act. As agreed upon by the conferees, such claims are permitted to be provable claims, provided that in no event shall a claim for damages be allowed in an amount exceeding the rent reserved by the lease for 1 year after surrender of the premises, plus the unpaid rent accrued to said date. The courts are directed to scrutinize the circumstances of an assignment of future rent claims and the consideration paid therefor in determining the amount of damages to be allowed an assignee. The provisions of this clause are made to apply to estates pending at the time of the enactment of this amendatory act.

On amendment no. 31: This amendment clarifies the intent of Congress that no cause of action not removable to the Federal court before the enactment of the railroad section of the Bankruptcy Act shall be removable by reason of the enactment of such section.

The House conferees agreed to the Senate amendment with the addition of a further provision requiring the remanding to the courts from which removed, all such suits heretofore removed to Federal court.

On amendment no. 32: Amendment 32 makes mandatory the appointment by the courts of bankruptcy within 30 days after the enactment of this act of a conciliation commissioner in every county having an agricultural population of 500 or more farmers for the administration of the agricultural composition section of the Bankruptcy Act enacted in March 1933. The House agreed to this amendment.

On amendment no. 33: By the terms of this Senate amendment the filing fee for farmers under the agricultural composition section is increased from $10 to $25 and the compensation of the conciliation commissioner is raised to $25 for each case filed.

Under the amendment agreed to by the conferees, the compensation for the commissioners is increased to $25 for each case, but the filing fee for farmers is left at $10.

On amendment no. 34: Amendment no. 34 amends the subdivision of the agricultural composition section extending the secondary liability in case of an extension granted the principal debtor so as to include within its provision those who may have insured, or guaranteed such debts, or bonds issued on the security thereof. The House agreed to the amendment.

HATTON W. SUMNERS,
RANDOLPH PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I present a House concurrent resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 40

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the House is authorized and directed, in the enrollment of the bill, H.R. 5884, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto", to strike out in the first section of said bill "Sec. 78" and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 77A", and in said section to strike out "section 79" wherever it appears and insert in lieu thereof "section 77B", and in said section to strike out "Sec. 79" and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 77B."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PRISON INDUSTRIES

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up House Resolution 369.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the majority leader if we are to have a night session?

Mr. BYRNS. We are, and we shall have to have a call of the House if a point of no quorum is sustained. If the gentleman wants to bring Members over here at 5 o'clock in order that we may take a recess to consider the Private Calendar this evening, that is his privilege, but I do hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will not the majority leader give us two hours and a half to sign up our mail and get up our notes on the numerous bills on the Private Calendar so we can be back here ready for the evening session?

Mr. BYRNS. I may say that I had understood from the gentleman from Georgia this would only take a few minutes.

Mr. SNELL. There is a controversy over this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill creates another board with members drawing $20 a day, and I am fundamentally against such a proposition. I think we have too many boards now.

Mr. BYRNS. Of course, if it is going to take time we cannot consider it now and we will take a recess, but I had the idea this would only require a few minutes.

Mr. HOLMES. I want to say that I have been fighting this for 15 years, and there are many objectionable features to the bill.

Mr. TARVER. This bill is to minimize the competition between prison labor and industry, and it is endorsed by the head of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. HOLMES. I want to say to the introducer of the resolution that that is not going to change the situation; but, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, the following leaves of absence were granted:

To Mr. FERNANDEZ, for 3 days, on account of official business.

To Mr. LANZETTA, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. THURSTON (at the request of Mr. DOWELL), indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. RANDOLPH, for 3 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LAMBETH, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. VINSON of Georgia, for 2 days, on account of official business.

To Mr. MCGRATH, for 4 days, on account of official business.

To Mr. KNIFFIN, for 2 days, on account of official business.

To Mr. DELANEY, for 2 days, on account of official business.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns tonight it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow. I want to say that that request is made in pursuance of a request by the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in order to give an additional hour for general debate tomorrow, and I hope no one will object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2745) to provide for the changing of time of the meeting of Congress, the beginning of the terms of Members of Congress, and the time when the electoral vote shall be counted, and for other purposes, an uncontested measure. It simply amends the law as to the election machinery so as to comply with the Norris amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. SNELL. Does this change anything except the count of the electoral vote?

Mr. LOZIER. It changes dates in the statute so as to harmonize with the constitutional amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Unless we do that we would not elect the President until after he was inaugurated.

Mr. LOZIER. Yes.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 152 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 3, sec. 41) is hereby amended by striking out the words "fourth day of March" and inserting in lieu thereof "20th day of January."

SEC. 2. Section 25 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 2, sec. 7) is hereby amended by striking out the words "fourth day of March" and inserting in lieu thereof "3d day of January."

SEC. 3. Section 1 of the act entitled "An act providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators", approved June 4, 1914 (U.S.C., title 2, sec. 1), is hereby amended by striking out "fourth day of March" and inserting in lieu thereof "3d day of January."

SEC. 4. The first sentence of section 20 of the act entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands", approved August 29, 1916 (U.S.C., title 48, sec. 1091), is hereby amended by striking out the words "fourth day of March" and inserting in lieu thereof "3d day of January."

SEC. 5. The second sentence of section 36 of the act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes", approved March 2, 1917 (U.S.C., title 48, sec. 891), is hereby amended by striking out the words "fourth of March" and inserting in lieu thereof "3d day of January."

SEC. 6. The act entitled "An act providing for the meeting of electors of President and Vice President and for the issuance and transmission of the certificates of their selection and of the result of their determination, and for other purposes", approved May 29, 1928, is hereby amended as follows:

(a) By striking out the words "first Wednesday in January" in section 1 of such act (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 3, sec. 5a) and inserting in lieu thereof "first Monday after the second Wednesday in December."

(b) By striking out the words "by the third Wednesday in the month of January" in section 5 of such act (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 3, sec. 11b) and inserting in lieu thereof "by the fourth Wednesday in December."

(c) By striking out the words "on the fourth Wednesday of the month of January" in section 6 of such act (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 3, sec. 11c) and inserting in lieu thereof "on the fourth Wednesday in December."

SEC. 7. The first sentence of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice President, and the decision of questions arising thereon", approved February 3, 1887 (U.S.C., title 3, sec. 17), is amended by striking out the words "second Wednesday in February" and inserting in lieu thereof "sixth day of January."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to make a statement in this connection. I drafted the bill of which this is amendatory. I want to suggest to the House that we are going to have to move up the time for electors about a month. We may get by this next election, but there is not enough time since the recent amendment to the Constitution intervening between the election of the electors and the time when they are to meet. There is not time enough to settle any contest as to the election to electors. The "lame-duck" amendment moves the whole program up from March to January. The time for the general election should be moved up to the first Tuesday in October or to about that time in order to allow a reasonable time for settling contests over the election of Presidential electors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The House bill was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a resolution adopted by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South during its recent quadrennial session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. GAVAGAN. I object. That is a dried-up subject.

RECESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House stand in recess until 7 o'clock and 30 minutes tonight.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly, at 5 p.m., the House stood in recess until 7:30 p.m.

EVENING SESSION

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 7:30 o'clock p.m.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, according to the agreement at the last call of the Private Calendar, I had permission to call up the bill, H.R. 6241, which was put over from the last call of the calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. And that is calendar number what?

Mr. BLOOM. Calendar no. 506.

Mr. BLANTON. We have not reached that yet.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

INTERNATIONAL ARMS & FUZE CO., INC.

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 6241) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of the International Arms & Fuze Co., Inc.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, this is a bill which seeks to permit this company to go before the Court of Claims and have heard and determined its claim against the Government. How much is its claim?

Mr. BLOOM. There is no telling. If it is found that this company owes the Government any money, they can collect that.

Mr. BLANTON. But surely it has in mind proving up some amount as claimed. Now, how much is it claiming against the Government?

Mr. BLOOM. They are not claiming any special amount.

Mr. BLANTON. Are they claiming 5 cents or $500,000,000?

Mr. BLOOM. They are only asking for the right to go before the Court of Claims and find out if there is anything owing to them. This company has done a business of $60,000,000 with the Government and without any complaint of any kind.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, the facts that I have in this case are these: There was a settlement by the Government with this company on November 10, 1919.

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And the Government has paid them $1,427,449.81.

Mr. BLOOM. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. Now they are coming in here and claiming some more.

Mr. BLOOM. No; they are not. When they made that settlement with the Government they gave a receipt for the amount of goods that was delivered to the Government at that time.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, this is what they signed: They signed a receipt and a settlement agreement with the Government wherein they acknowledged, "We have received $1,427,449.81 in full adjustment, payment, and discharge of said contract."

Mr. BLOOM. On the goods that they had delivered.

Mr. BLANTON. On "their contract." Now, if that was a full adjustment, settlement, and payment of their contract, why should we let them come and sue again?

Mr. BLOOM. They are not suing.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, whenever you bring a matter before the Court of Claims it is suing. It is not anything else but suing. You appear there with your lawyers and you present your evidence, and by this bill you are seeking to waive the limitation. The limitation has run against them, and we would be waiving the limitation and letting them come into the Court of Claims and present evidence of an additional claim, after they have acknowledged full settlement with the Government, if we pass this bill.

Mr. BLOOM. If I might be permitted to answer the gentleman, I should like to say that the amount they settled for at that time was——

Mr. BLANTON. Was a very good sum. Of course, to my good friend from New York who owns many of the picture shows and theaters in his great metropolis, the sum of $1,427,000 is a mere bagatelle, but down with us poor folks it is a pretty good sum of money.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman allow me to explain to him?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BLOOM. The committee which gave this receipt to sign in the testimony says that that settlement was made only for the goods that they had delivered up to that time. Now, let me say to the gentleman that during the war this company did $60,000,000 worth of business with the United States Government without any complaint.

Mr. BLANTON. And they got about $60,000,000 in money from the Government. That gave them a tremendous profit.

Mr. BLOOM. But the Government was getting $60,000,000 in value. They only ask now to go to the Court of Claims to prove whether the Government owes them any money. The testimony of the entire Government committee at that time in the evidence shows that they claimed this was not a final settlement in that sense of the word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there is no Member of this House who would go further to grant a personal favor to our good colleague from New York, Mr. BLOOM, than I. I think as much of him as any other Member of this House, but this way of waiving limitation is all wrong, after they come in and sign a settlement agreement with the Government—they ought to take their medicine and live up to it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The record discloses that this was not accepted in full accord and satisfaction.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, they put their "John Hancock" on this language, "In full adjustment, payment, and discharge of said contract."

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have gone into it carefully, and the understanding was that that was up to that point in the settlement.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to the gentleman, who has been doing some good service on this calendar since he has been here, what is the use of our putting this additional clause on each of these bill that we pass, that "this shall be in full settlement of all claims against the United States Government" if we do not mean it?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I put the same question to the gentleman from New York and he was able to show me from the RECORD a reason for it.

Mr. BLOOM. I may say that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD] objected to this bill and I went all over it with him. He objected as strenuously as has the gentleman from Texas. It is an absolute fact that this receipt was given just the same as every receipt is given to the Government; they were asked to sign this statement; but it was understood that the final settlement was only up to the moment of signing. The members of the Government board testifying under oath said that that was not a final settlement.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman from New York think that the Government, having given this concern $60,000,000 worth of business, has done pretty well by it?

Mr. BLOOM. There is no question about that, but at the same time the Secretary of War at that time gave this concern a diploma, saying that it was one of the best firms they had traded with. Now, if there is any reason to believe that there is anything coming to this firm and they made a settlement at that time, with the understanding that there would be another adjudication, they should have their day in court; and I believe the gentleman from Texas wants to give this firm its rights.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I notice that this concern has another claim; the bill No. 720 on the calendar is for this same concern and is another bill waiving the statute of limitations in their favor.

Mr. BLOOM. No; I may explain to the gentleman from Texas, Mr. Speaker, that that is a bill which has passed the Senate and was amended by the Senate. If unanimous consent is given for the consideration of the bill at this time, I shall ask permission to substitute the Senate bill as amended.

Mr. BLANTON. This is Senate bill 2809.

Mr. BLOOM. That is what it is; that is what I want to have considered; and I shall ask unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill that we are now talking about (H.R. 6241).

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman accept an amendment to the effect that in connection with the adjudication of this claim the Court of Claims is directed to consider the settlement that has already been made by the Government and is to not grant anything to this company above what was legally undetermined in the former settlement? With such language in the bill I would not object; but the company received a million and nearly four hundred thousand dollars in settlement of their contract. It has been my observation that when in cases of this kind we waive the statute of limitations and permit the company to sue in the Court of Claims the Court of Claims assumes that Congress has directed them to open the case up and pay them whatever they might have claimed originally.

Mr. BLOOM. I do not believe that is the case.

Mr. BLANTON. I have watched these cases, and the Court of Claims takes such bills as directions from Congress.

Mr. BLOOM. If the Court of Claims says the company has nothing coming to it, that will be the end of it. On the other hand I think the Court of Claims can be trusted to do justice should anything more be found to be due the company.

Mr. BLANTON. I want such a provision in this bill that the Court of Claims will be reminded that Congress had the former settlement in mind, and that such settlement must be considered.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may go over for a few minutes, until the gentleman from Texas can write out his suggestion so I may see just what it is.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask the gentleman from New York if this is a claim arising out of war profits from the manufacture of munitions?

Mr. BLOOM. This company manufactured munitions and sold the Government $60,000,000 worth of munitions; and the Government gives them a clean bill of health, stating that it was one of the best concerns with which they did business.

Mr. TRUAX. And the company probably made a handsome profit; that is the way it went.

Mr. BLOOM. If they made a profit, doubtless they were entitled to it.

Mr. TRUAX. As I recall, during the war, there grew up 20,000 new millionaires in this country.

Mr. McFARLANE. I think the number was 33,000.

Mr. TRUAX. One for every two and a fraction American doughboys who were killed.

Mr. EAGLE. And all of them are broke now.

Mr. TRUAX. Who does the gentleman mean are broke now?

Mr. McFARLANE. The boys who fought the war.

Mr. TRUAX. The boys; yes, that is correct; that is a statement of fact.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is time this Government and this Congress ceased giving even consideration to bills that go back to profits made during the war by men who are now getting refunds of income taxes, men who made millions of dollars during the war.

Mr. BLOOM. I do not believe the gentleman wants to say that these people were profiteers. They were doing work for this Government; somebody had to do the work.

Mr. TRUAX. Yes; and they made plenty of money.

Mr. BLOOM. They have lost money.

Mr. TRUAX. I never heard of any munitions manufacturer losing money.

Mr. BLOOM. If this is a just claim, these people certainly are entitled to be heard by the Court of Claims whether there is any money coming to them or not.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I have a letter from a gentleman connected with the Court of Claims complimenting me on the position I have taken with reference to the refund of income taxes.

Mr. COLLINS of California. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. TRUAX. If the regular order is demanded, Mr. Speaker, then, I shall have to object to the bill.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman states that just because the regular order is demanded he objects. I do not think I should be put in this position.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be put aside without prejudice until 9 o'clock this evening, so that we may agree upon an amendment that will fully protect the Government.

Mr. LEE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ROLAND ZOLESKY

Mr. CANNON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to no. 399 on the Private Calendar (H.R. 3912), a bill for the relief of Roland Zolesky.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, we have our calendar arranged, and this is a bill that we have left in our office. We understood we were going to begin at the star, Private Calendar 406.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I objected to this bill on a previous occasion because the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CANNON] threatened to object to every bill if this bill was not passed. That is the only reason I did not insist at that time. I understand this bill has been threshed out upon its merits, and that it is a meritorious bill and should be passed. Personally, I am going to object to any other bill that is called out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500 to Roland Zolesky as compensation for injuries sustained, without fault or negligence on his part, when on the 26th day of February 1919, at Milwaukee, Wis., by reason of the negligent supervision and control by agents and officers of the United States Government of certain tests of rifle grenades, the said Roland Zolesky came into possession of a certain rifle grenade which exploded with great force, causing permanent injuries to his right arm and face: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SETTLEMENT OF MILITARY CLAIMS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6856, to authorize the settlement of individual claims of military personnel for damages to and loss of private property incident to the training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the bill for the reason that we do not want to establish a precedent of the Government becoming the insurer for property of officers or privates in foreign countries lost by fire or water.

CHURCH OF THE GOOD SHEPHERD, MEMPHIS, TENN.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7161, to provide for the refund or abatement of the customs duty on altar candlesticks and cross imported for the Church of the Good Shepherd, Memphis, Tenn.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to refund or abate the customs duty (consumption entry no. 023, June 26, 1933) assessed on altar candlesticks and cross imported by Canon Hiram K. Douglass for the Church of the Good Shepherd, Memphis, Tenn.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILLIAM CHINSKY

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7697, for the relief of William Chinsky.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Illinois if he is willing to accept some amendments to this bill? First of all, may I ask him why there is any necessity for a guardian? This accident happened in 1919. At that time the boy was 12 or 13 years old. He must be 27 years old now.

Mr. SABATH. I do not think there is a guardian required at this time.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I think the amount should be cut to $2,000.

Mr. SABATH. It should have been $5,000. By mistake it was introduced in this way. It was cut the last time. Have you seen a picture of the boy?

Mr. BLANCHARD. May I ask about his present physical condition?

Mr. SABATH. He is maimed and crippled for life. The amount should have been $5,000, and it was cut down to $2,500.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have no objection with that understanding.

Mr. HENNEY. How did this accident happen?

Mr. SABATH. He picked up a grenade and it exploded and maimed him for life.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the legal guardian of William Chinsky the sum of $2,500, in compensation for injuries sustained as the result of an explosion of a hand grenade which he had picked up in Grant Park, Chicago, Ill., October 12, 1919.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 9, after the figures "1919" insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, certainly the words "to the legal guardian" should be stricken from this bill.

Mr. SABATH. I will accept an amendment to that effect.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: Line 5, page 1, after the word "appropriated", strike out the words "to the legal guardian."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LOUIS ZAGATA

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7698, for the relief of Louis Zagata.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. YOUNG. I withhold the objection, but I will probably object later.

Mr. SABATH. This is a case where a friend gave a bond for an individual who was here illegally. He gave the bond in good faith, and when he was informed that the man had not surrendered he looked for him and the man had disappeared. He worked on the matter for nearly a year or a year and a half and helped apprehend the man. He did apprehend him, and finally the individual was deported. I think he has acted as a good, loyal citizen in the performance of his duty, and that he should not be punished for his effort and service that he rendered in apprehending the man.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, Louis Zagata signed the bond for $1,000. It was his duty as bondsman to have the culprit in court and in the presence of the magistrate at all times. I insist on the objection.

WOODHOUSE CHAIN WORKS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 177, for the relief of Woodhouse Chain Works.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Woodhouse Chain Works the sum of $352.93 in full settlement for extra work for which the Government agreed to pay under the supplemental contract to contract no. 448 with the Navy Department.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELIZABETH BOLGER

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 785, for the relief of Elizabeth Bolger.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the amount of $1,000 should be reduced to $700, and I understand that such an amendment will be acceptable to the committee.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay Elizabeth Bolger the sum of $1,000 in full settlement of all claims against the Government on account of personal injuries sustained as the result of the carelessness of the driver of Navy automobile no. 637, on April 5, 1919, in Brooklyn, N.Y.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIONCHECK: Line 4, strike out "$1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$700."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the usual attorneys' fee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: At the end of line 8, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

E. WALTER EDWARDS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1073, for the relief of E. Walter Edwards.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to E. Walter Edwards, successor to C. B. Edwards & Bro., of Raleigh, N.C., out of money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $106.30, in full satisfaction of all claims for payment of premium on a policy of fire insurance written in 1918 by C. B. Edwards & Bro., covering certain goods of the value of $127,000, more or less, while in the process of being laundered for the United States Army by the Model Laundry of Raleigh, N.C.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

M'KIMMON & M'KEE, INC.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1081, for the relief of McKimmon & McKee, Inc.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to McKimmon & McKee, Inc., successor to the Raleigh Insurance & Realty Co., of Raleigh, N.C., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $71.59 in full satisfaction of all claims for payment of premiums on policies of fire insurance written in 1918 by such Raleigh Insurance & Realty Co., covering certain goods of the value of $95,000, more or less, while in the process of being laundered for the United States Army by the Model Laundry, of Raleigh, N.C.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

KORBER REALTY, INC.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1321, authorizing adjustment of the claim of Korber Realty, Inc.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

WALTER J. BRYSON PAVING CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1504, for the relief of Walter J. Bryson Paving Co.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ESTATE OF GEORGE B. SPEARIN, DECEASED

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1680, for the relief of the estate of George B. Spearin, deceased.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to this bill. It involves $141,180. If we do not stop bills like this, our Treasury will be depleted.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. If the Membership is willing, but eventually I shall have to object.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I also object to this bill.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the amount is $5,616.29 and not $140,000.

Mr. BLANTON. The principal paid was $141,180.

Mr. TRUAX. Well, it should have been filed April 13, 1916.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Will the gentleman permit me to make a brief statement in reference to the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. There has been $141,180 paid, has there not?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. The principal amount of the claim; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The principal is paid and this is interest?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. That is correct.

Mr. TRUAX. I object, Mr. Speaker.

WILLIAM T. ROCHE

The clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6696, for the relief of William T. Roche.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is my understanding that there has been an amendment prepared striking out everything after the enacting clause and providing a lump-sum settlement of $1,000.

Mr. GILLETTE. $2,500.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Suppose we make it $2,000.

Mr. GILLETTE. We will make the change.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. With that understanding, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

There being no objection, the clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 17 and 20 of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended, are hereby waived in favor of William T. Roche, who lost both his hands as a result of his duties as a rural mail carrier.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GILLETTE: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to William T. Roche, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,000 as full compensation to said William T. Roche for the loss of both hands as a result of freezing, without negligence on his part, while he was engaged in the regular performance of his duties as a rural mail carrier in Sac County, State of Iowa."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the usual attorneys' fee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: At the end of the bill, after the word "Iowa", strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILLIE LOUISE JOHNSTON

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H.R. 6861, for the relief of Willie Louise Johnston.

Mr. TRUAX and Mr. BLANTON objected.

MARY FORD CONRAD

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H.R. 6943, to extend the benefits of the Employers' Liability Act September 7, 1916, to Mary Ford Conrad.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I reserve an objection. The policy is not to go behind 1916.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. This does not go behind that date. All the bill does is to enable this lady, who was ignorant of the law, to come in and file her claim and have her day in court as other people have. Whether she gets anything depends on what the Compensation Board does about it.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. As I understand the case, the claimant worked for the Treasury Department and was in good health at the time she left. Later on, after she quit work, she became sick and decided that it was caused by her labor in the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. My friend has so many things on his mind with reference to these cases that he is not always able to keep the facts in mind. This lady did not quit while she was in good health. She collapsed while at work with heart trouble.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. How long after she left was she taken sick?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. She was taken sick while at work, and she was attended by a physician. His affidavit is in the case. She did not get anything by the way of compensation, because she did not know anything about the compensation law.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, the Secretary of the Treasury says there is no merit in this bill. I want to read a part of his statement:

Although it is possible that Mrs. Conrad's health may have been somewhat affected by the overtime work, there is nothing of record in this Department to show that her ill health was caused by any injury or unfavorable working conditions while in the performance of her duties during the period cited in the bill. While this Department would not interpose any objection to the passage of the bill, in view of the circumstances connected with the case, I would refrain from submitting an opinion as to its merit.

If the Department says there is nothing to show that the Government is liable, why mulct the Government?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The gentleman was good enough to read what the Secretary of the Treasury says, who knows nothing about the matter, will he be good enough to read what her immediate superior, who did know, said about it?

Mr. BLANTON. When you go into court you do not try the case on affidavits; you try it on evidence that has probitive force and effect. You cannot come into court and say that a man was injured in the service—that is a conclusion. You have to produce evidence that has probitive force establishing facts to warrant such a conclusion. If we are going to extend this act to take in such cases, we might as well take down the door of the Treasury and leave it wide open and let everybody come in and help themselves by the armful.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. If the gentleman has firmly made up his mind to object, regardless of the facts, I do not want to take up any more time.

Mr. BLANTON. To establish such a bad precedent, sooner or later, would cost the Government of the United States millions of dollars. Thousands of similar claims would result.

I have been watching these bills to keep us from setting a bad precedent, and we have had some very good help from our friends, especially the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK], and others. I object.

J. W. ANDERSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6944, for the relief of J. W. Anderson.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I think this claim goes back to 1921, when this party, pursuing some prisoners, fell under the train.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. That is correct.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The $4,700 provided in the bill is the amount which he would have received had the present compensation law been in effect in 1921.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. That is correct.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. As a matter of fact, we have been objecting to all of these bills.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I do not think that we have had a bill like this.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. What is the distinguishing feature between this bill and the other bills?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The particular distinguishing feature is the fact that this does not cost the Government of the United States anything. This is a claim against the government of the District of Columbia and is to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia by the taxpayers of the District of Columbia, and is recommended by the governing board of the District, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Virginia wholly unconcerned about the interests of the people of the District of Columbia and their treasury?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. If the gentleman is going to allow me to answer that question, I shall be delighted to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has intimated that. He says that this will not come out of the Treasury of the Government, but it will come out of the treasury of the District of Columbia and, therefore, intimating that we should be unconcerned. That is the result of his argument.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. The gentleman has misquoted me. When the gentleman finishes I should like to have something to say about this bill, but I do not want to do so until he has finished.

Mr. BLANTON. As we are the guardians of the people of the District, and their treasury, I am just as much concerned about improperly taking money out of their treasury as I am out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I know the gentleman is. He demonstrates that every day.

Mr. SABATH. There is no question but that the gentleman is interested not only in the people of his district, but he has demonstrated fully to the House and to various committees that he is also interested in the people of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. McFARLANE. I will withhold my objection.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman agrees to withhold his objection on the Anderson bill.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ERNEST LINWOOD STEWART

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7073, for the relief of Ernest Linwood Stewart.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

FRANK BAGLIONE

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7107, for the relief of Frank Baglione.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. The only question I have in this case is the amount. I think $3,500 would be amply sufficient for the injuries received.

Mr. DOUGLASS. Mr. Speaker, this boy has a fractured skull and the danger of such a case is what the future will bring.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. How long was he in the hospital?

Mr. DOUGLASS. I do not know the exact date.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. He was in the hospital a short time.

Mr. DOUGLASS. Should the gentleman insist on his amendment I would have to submit.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. With the understanding that the amendment will be agreed to, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to ask some questions about this case.

Mr. DOUGLASS. This boy was 5 years old when hit by a mail wagon negligently driven by a United States Government employee. He was severely injured. His family suffered and he suffered. If the gentleman had a child with a fractured skull I am sure that he would want the boy compensated.

Mr. BLANTON. I think it is a just claim for $3,500.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLASS. The Post Office Department admits its liability.

Mr. McFARLANE. It was the negligence of the Department?

Mr. DOUGLASS. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Frank Baglione, of Suffolk County, Boston, Mass., the sum of $5,000 for damages to his son, Vincent Baglione, caused by negligence on the part of the employees of the United States in the operation of a mail truck owned and operated by the United States Government on March 19, 1924.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, after "$5,000" insert: "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

At the end of the bill after the figures "1924" insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIONCHECK: Page 1, line 6, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$3,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

HOWARD LEWTER

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7167, for the relief of Howard Lewter.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADDIE I. TRYON AND LORIN H. TRYON

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7181, for the relief of Addie I. Tryon and Lorin H. Tryon.

Mr. TRUAX and Mr. ZIONCHECK objected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

M. N. LIPINSKI

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7264, for the relief of M. N. Lipinski.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Minnesota please state the circumstances of this bill? As I recall, there was some kind of poison put into a lake by the Department of Agriculture, which was supposed to have killed some cattle.

Mr. ARENS. The Department of Agriculture got permission to experiment by putting poison in a couple of small lakes to eliminate vegetation and weeds, with the assurance that the poison was not sufficient to kill cattle. This was done in May and June. Arsenic was used, and it was determined that it was poison, and by fall the cattle had died. He lost 11 head of Hereford cattle, and the rest of them were badly affected. It was discovered that the continuous drinking of water killed the cattle.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. How many cattle were killed?

Mr. ARENS. I think there were 11 cattle killed, but the entire herd was damaged.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Eleven of them at $100 each would be $1,100.

Mr. ARENS. The whole herd of some 200 herd were affected. Many of them would have died if it had not been for the fact that the cattle were withdrawn on account of winter setting in. The cattle were affected by it. Eleven actually died.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The Bureau of Fisheries contends that the solution which they used for experimental purposes was so weak that it could not affect cattle. I think if the gentleman would accept an amendment to accept compensation for just the cattle which actually died at $100 each, that is, $1,100, it would be sufficient compensation and I would be inclined to withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. ARENS. Of course, I have no right to compromise. I have asked the gentleman himself whether $1,900 was not a lot of money for 11 head, but he said he would have lost more than that. Of course, I would rather take $1,100 than not take anything.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. In what year did this occur?

Mr. ARENS. In 1929.

Mr. TRUAX. What kind of cattle were these?

Mr. ARENS. They were Hereford cattle.

Mr. TRUAX. Beef cattle?

Mr. ARENS. Beef cattle.

Mr. TRUAX. How big were they?

Mr. ARENS. Oh, they were feeder cattle; probably ten or eleven or twelve hundred pounds.

Mr. TRUAX. They were not fat?

Mr. ARENS. They should have been. They were not, but they should have been and they would have been if it had not been on account of the poison in their systems.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Is the gentleman contending that the Government should pay for the potential beef?

Mr. ARENS. I think the Government should have known that the poison was ruinous to the cattle. His cattle would have been in good condition if it were not for the poison in the water.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Is not $100 a pretty good price for one beef today, or at the time this damage took place?

Mr. ARENS. It was not in 1929. The gentleman will remember that cattle brought $14 and $15 a hundred pounds at that time.

Mr. TRUAX. What business did the Bureau of Fisheries have in there killing weeds?

Mr. ARENS. They were experimenting to eliminate vegetation in water in these little lakes. They got permission from the man provided the poison was not sufficient to damage the cattle, but it did.

Mr. TRUAX. What were they trying to poison?

Mr. ARENS. They were trying to kill vegetation, weeds and grass which grow in water.

Mr. McFARLANE. What year was this experimenting going on?

Mr. ARENS. Nineteen hundred and twenty-nine.

Mr. TRUAX. I would say that from what little knowledge I have of the Bureau of Fisheries there never was any attempt to kill weeds and vegetation, because grasshoppers and insects which infest these weeds are feed for the fish.

I think the claimant has a good claim, and I am not going to object.

Mr. ARENS. These lakes are not natural lakes, and there are no fish in them. As a matter of fact, they are nothing but puddles of water created by the spring overflows of the Mississippi River. These puddles stay in the pasture all summer. They are not natural lakes.

Mr. TRUAX. I would say that this case is comparable with experiments of the Department of Agriculture now being carried on.

Mr. ARENS. I think it was a worthy experiment; I am not criticizing the Department because they made the experiment.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman will accept $100 a head for the cattle actually killed, I shall have to object.

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Speaker, I will accept $1,100 if I cannot get $1,900, although I think the claimant is entitled to $1,900.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. With that understanding I shall not object.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and in full and complete settlement, to M. N. Lipinski the sum of $1,980 as reimbursement for damages sustained in the losses of livestock by poisoning as the result of weed-killing experiments conducted by the Bureau of Fisheries of the Department of Commerce on premises used for pasture purposes by M. N. Lipinski: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIONCHECK: Page 1, line 6, strike out "$1,980" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,100."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN W. ADAIR

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7272, for the relief of John W. Adair.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to offer two amendments at the proper time.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I intend to offer an amendment to increase the compensation from $15 to $30 a month. I think it is a very small amount if there is any merit whatever to the claim.

Mr. HOPE. I shall have no objection to the gentleman's amendment if he thinks $15 is too small.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I doubt whether it is advisable to double the amount when the author of the bill does not ask for it.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I think the Representative introducing the bill was very modest in fixing the amount.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly the author of the bill knew the amount to which the claimant was entitled.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I understand the claimant was killed fighting fires. The payment of $15 a month for 8 years is certainly a niggardly sum to pay for a life.

Mr. BLANTON. Is our colleague from Arizona willing for this amount to be doubled?

Mrs. GREENWAY. The gentleman can imagine how grateful I would be.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not stand in our colleague's way.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", are hereby extended to John W. Adair, of Pinetop, Ariz., for the death of his son, John Robin Adair, who lost his life on June 21, 1916, while fighting a forest fire on the Fort Apache Indian Reservation; and the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is authorized and directed to pay compensation to John W. Adair as a partial dependent parent at the rate of $15 per month for a period of 8 years from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIONCHECK: page 2, line 2, strike out "$15" and insert "$30."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOPE: Page 2, line 3, after the word "act", strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, That no compensation shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act, and the payments above provided for shall be in full settlement of all claims against the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the usual attorney-fee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOPE: At the end of the bill add the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DONALD K. WARNER

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7372, for the relief of Donald K. Warner.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and in full settlement against the Government, to Donald K. Warner, former postmaster at Oakdale, Nebr., the sum of $869.17, being the amount of stamps and postal funds lost in the burglary of the post office on the night of December 13, 1928.

With the following committee amendment:

At the end of the bill on page 1, line 10, insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LETTIE LEVERETT

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7448, for the relief of Lettie Leverett.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. HOPE. Yes; I will withhold my objection if the gentleman desires to explain the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised to hear the gentleman object. There is no objection on the Democratic side. I feel sure if the distinguished gentleman from Kansas knew the facts of this case and knew the parties involved he certainly would not object to such a meritorious measure.

The original claim in this case was for $15,000 for the relief of the widow of one Silas Leverett, who was killed on the Fort Sill military reservation while under orders of an Army officer. The evidence shows that one E. C. McCormick, of Elgin, Okla., was given permission to cut hay on the military reservation, and that the deceased was employed by McCormick. I will admit it was understood that in case of fire McCormick and those working for him would fight it; but it is not reasonable to believe that anyone could anticipate the very unusual circumstances involved in this case. May I state that deceased lost his life while under orders of an Army officer.

This man was about one-fourth of a mile from the fire and was in absolute safety beyond the reach of the fire when the Army officer in question rode up to where he was at work and ordered deceased and his crew of 13 men to get on a truck and fight the prairie fire. In obedience to the command of the Army officer deceased climbed on the truck, which was operated by a soldier under command and supervision of the Army officer and driven into a dangerous position. The deceased lost his life while under direct orders of an officer of the Army. He left a penniless widow and three minor children. It is a clear-cut case, and this Government has heretofore accepted responsibility in similar cases and surely will not refuse to do so in this instance.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the War Department has made an adverse report on this bill and that it is the contention of the Department that this man's death was not in any way due to any act on the part of any employee or official of the United States Government; and further, that when this man went on the reservation as a civilian employee of a contractor who had permission to cut hay on the reservation it was explained to him that he was there on his own liability and that the Government of the United States undertook to assume no liability and that he was subject to whatever might occur in the way of gunfire or any other action that might befall him while he was on the reservation? The gentleman understands that that is the War Department's contention?

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I have read the report, but the War Department is not altogether correct in giving this information. I have also discussed the facts with some of the parties involved. I have talked to some of the officers involved, and I know that this report does not altogether comply with the facts, because this man lost his life through no negligence of his own, but while under command of an Army officer. Remember, my good friend, before pressing your objection, that a soldier was driving a truck and that neither the deceased, his widow, nor either of his dependent children are responsible for the death of this man; but if the gentleman still insists on his objection, I will do my utmost to satisfy him before the bill comes up for consideration again.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, may I say that the gentleman has had an opportunity to explain the bill and to make a statement. If any other gentlemen desire to object, they have ample opportunity to object, and I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

K. S. SZYMANSKI

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7618, for the relief of K. S. Szymanski.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ARTHUR A. BURN, SR., AND J. K. RYLAND

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7631, for the relief of Arthur A. Burn, Sr., and J. K. Ryland.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. HOPE. I will be glad to withhold my objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman state the ground for objection to the bill?

Mr. HOPE. The report in this case shows that both of these men who were killed were not men who left dependent families. The parents of one of them filed a claim with the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, an award was made, and the claim has been settled in that way.

In the case of the other man, the parents apparently were not dependents; at least, they made no claim of dependency, but the United States Compensation Commission paid the burial expenses and also made an award in favor of a dependent sister. This award was paid for some time, and then ceased because the sister married and was no longer dependent.

I cannot conceive under these circumstances why the Federal Government has any further liability to the parents of these young men. A finding was made by the Employees' Compensation Commission that the parents of one of the young men were dependent, and they were given the usual award of compensation. It seems to me that is sufficient in that particular case.

There is no showing in the case of the other man that the parents were dependent, and I cannot see why the Government of the United States should pay $5,000 to the parents of either of these young men. I acknowledge that their death was caused through no act of their own and through the fault and negligence of an officer of the United States, but I do not believe that puts upon the United States an obligation to pay this large sum of money to the parents who were not dependent upon them, except in the degree stated.

Mr. McMILLAN. The gentleman admits that these deaths were caused as a result of the negligence of a superior officer.

Mr. HOPE. There is not any question about that fact.

Mr. McMILLAN. I may say that the father of one of these boys has not filed his claim simply out of a matter of pride. He did not want to file a claim against the Government, but, like a great many people, adversity has hit him.

In the case of the other man, there was a sister 18 years of age left and I assume the gentleman is not going to deny payment of the claim simply because she goes out, like many other girls, and gets married in a year or two. As I see this case, it is an absolute liability on the part of the Government where these two men, under orders of a superior officer, were taken out on board a ship which was not seaworthy and were drowned. There is undoubtedly a liability on the part of the Government.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPE. I object.

K. S. SZYMANSKI

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar 486, the bill (H.R. 7618) for the relief of K. S. Szymanski.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object to returning to any bills that have been passed.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman to withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the next bill.

CARRIE PRICE ROBERTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7716, for the relief of Carrie Price Roberts.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice and be the first bill called up at the next call of the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BYRNS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

K. S. SZYMANSKI

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calender No. 486.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ROSEMUND PAULINE LOWRY

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7781, for the relief of Rosemund Pauline Lowry.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Rosemund Pauline Lowry, widow of Edward Prindle Lowry, late second secretary to the American Embassy at Mexico City, the sum of $4,500, being 1 year's salary of her deceased husband who died while in foreign service; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient sum to carry out the purpose of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 11, insert: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

I. T. M'REE

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7789, for the relief of I. T. McRee.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I state to the proponents of the bill that the amount is $2,500, and I think $1,250 would be ample.

Mr. TURNER. This is a very meritorious case and I do not think this is really as much as the claimant is entitled to receive. The doctor states he is permanently injured.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. What is the nature of his permanent injury?

Mr. TURNER. This man was shot from ambush, and I do not know that I can tell the gentleman just what his permanent injury is, but the doctors state that, due to his limited education, his livelihood was provided for by manual labor; and since this wound prohibits him from doing such labor you can readily see that he is entitled to some assistance from the Government.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I had in mind the same objection—not to the bill but to the amount. I think the amount should be cut down to at least $2,000.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I had in mind $1,250 or $1,500.

Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that the amount will be reduced to $2,000, we will let the bill go through.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a similar Senate bill will be considered in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. How much does the Senate bill provide?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The same amount.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to I. T. McRee, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500 in full settlement of damages sustained April 11, 1922, in a prohibition raid in Lewis County, Tenn., when he was shot from ambush: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIONCHECK to the Senate bill: Line 6, strike out "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider and a similar House bill were laid on the table.

OSWALD H. HALFORD ET AL.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7816, for the relief of Oswald H. Halford, Hunter M. Henry, William C. Horne, Rupert R. Johnson, David L. Lacey, William Z. Lee, Fenton F. Rodgers, Henry Freeman Seale, Felix M. Smith, Edwin C. Smith, Robert S. Sutherland, and Charles G. Ventress.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ELLZEY of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. MOTT. Yes.

Mr. ELLZEY of Mississippi. I should like to make this statement to the gentleman from Oregon. This bill provides for two-thirds of the pay during the World War of some enlisted men. What they did was that just before leaving for France, having been in the service about 1 year, they took French leave to say good-bye to their folks. They then returned and rendered good service. There were 13 of them in all, and the Secretary of War states that they rendered good service and that their records were good, both prior to this event as well as afterward.

Mr. BLANTON. But the Secretary of War recommends against the bill.

Mr. ELLZEY of Mississippi. That is true, but here is what he did. There were 13 men and they refunded 1 man's pay—Private Hardy—but withheld two-thirds of the pay from the other men, and I believe that this is simply doing simple justice to all these men. I do not believe any man on this floor would want to see this kind of injustice done. They refunded all of one man's pay but withheld two-thirds of the pay in the other cases.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, in view of the gentleman's statement I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Patrick J. Hurley, former Secretary of War, says that these men were courtmartialed and tried and given from 1 to 3 years' confinement.

Mr. ELLZEY of Mississipi. And he also stated this:

Each soldier is shown to have conscientiously and faithfully performed his duty prior to his absence and even after his return to military control.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States, to Oswald H. Halford, bugler (1599067), $76.63; Hunter M. Henry, private, first-class (1599070), $192.13; William C. Horne, wagoner (1599034), $226.77; Rupert R. Johnson, corporal (1599036), $220.94; David L. Lacey, private, first-class (1599038), $214.73; William Z. Lee, private (1599080), $203.60; Fenton F. Rodgers, private (1599092), $151.47; Henry Freeman Seale, wagoner (1599094), $193.17; Felix M. Smith, private (1599021), $193.38; Edwin C. Smith, private, first-class (1599047), $79.80; Robert S. Sutherland, bugler (1599102), $78.55; Charles G. Ventress, sergeant (1599107), $253.06; being amount of salary deducted on account of general court-martial sentences June 1918: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this Act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RALPH LAVERN WALKER

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H.R. 7893, for the relief of Ralph LaVern Walker.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500 to the legal guardian of Ralph LaVern Walker for the loss of his arm and other injuries as the result of an explosion of a cap on the site of Camp Gordon on February 23, 1929.

SEC. 2. That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the legal guardian of Ralph LaVern Walker the sum of $50 per month, beginning with the passage of this act and continuing for the period of 8 years: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of $100 shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of $100 on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000: Provided further, That the above amounts shall be in full settlement against the Government.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MYRTLE ANDERSON

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H.R. 7990, for the relief of Myrtle Anderson.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I object.

PAUL J. SISK

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 85, for the relief of Paul J. Sisk.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General is authorized and directed to settle and certify for payment to Paul J. Sisk, a clerk in the post office at Spokane, Wash., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the amount of $60, on account of an erroneous payment by him on money order no. 234886, for that amount, issued at Payette, Idaho, on September 5, 1931.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MILBURN KNAPP

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 256, for the relief of Milburn Knapp.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill carries $16,000 and the gentleman from Oregon should explain its merits.

Mr. TRUAX. I object.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman reserve the objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve it.

Mr. PIERCE. I want to say that this is a very just claim.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BLANTON. Well, if you demand the regular order and are not going to allow the gentleman from Oregon to make a statement, I will withdraw my objection, and let him pass his bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Milburn Knapp, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $16,000 in full settlement of all claims against the United States for losses sustained by him as the result of the revocation by the Department of the Interior, on November 12, 1913, of a permit granted for the use of the Williamson River in connection with a contract for the cutting and removal of certain timberlands in the Klamath Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, entered into on January 24, 1913, by Milburn Knapp and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on behalf of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FAIRMONT CREAMERY CO.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 749, for the relief of the Fairmont Creamery Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I object.

MRS. ASA CASWELL HAWKINS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 1078, for the relief of Mrs. Asa Caswell Hawkins.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I object.

EDGAR STIVERS

The Clerk called the next business on the Private Calendar, S. 1460, for the relief of Edgar Stivers.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the account of Edgar Stivers, postmaster at Dodge Center, Minn., in the sum of $240.45, due the United States on account of loss of postal funds resulting from the failure of the Farmers National Bank of Dodge Center, Minn.: Provided, That the said postmaster shall assign to the United States any and all claims he may have to dividends arising from the liquidation of said bank.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

STANDARD DREDGING CO.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 1633, for the relief of the Standard Dredging Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I object.

EDGAR STIVERS

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar No. 835, H.R. 4895, for the relief of Edgar Stivers, be stricken from the Private Calendar and laid on the table, as an identical bill has just been passed.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Reserving the right to object, is the gentleman sure of that?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I am sure of it, because it is my own bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

R. B. MILLER

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2278, for the relief of R. B. Miller.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I object.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the last 8 or 10 bills on the calendar have been Senate bills. We must remember that House bills will have to be considered in the Senate. It seems to me gentlemen objecting to Senate bills should briefly explain their objection so that the Senator interested will be informed why objection is advanced. I think we owe this to the author of a Senate bill.

Mr. TRUAX. I shall be very glad to state. I object to the bill because it goes back and dips into the Treasury on war profits, away back in 1921.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I have no criticism to make of the gentleman's objection, but my thought is the objector should state why he objects. We passed a bill a moment ago to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] at first objected.

Then, because someone demanded the regular order, he withdrew his objection, and, no other objection being recorded, the bill was passed.

I have read the report upon the bill since the measure was passed. I see no reason why the Government of the United States should pay any money to the claimant. That is the bill of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. BLANTON. But the Department said that it was a just bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But the Department in the middle of its statement said the Department never gave the claimant the right to use that river at the time the contract was made.

Mr. BLANTON. But it finally approved the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is true, but at the same time it appears to me the contractor had no just claim against the Government. The contractor never could have recovered in the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ERNEST ELMORE HALL

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3176, for the relief of Ernest Elmore Hall.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill, being no. 503 on the Private Calendar, and the next bill, H.R. 3179, for the relief of William J. Cocke, no. 504 on the Private Calendar, be passed over without prejudice, to be called at the next call of the Private Calendar, for the reason that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEAVER], who introduced these bills, is not here.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that request, insofar as no. 503, H.R. 3176, the bill just called by the Clerk, is concerned?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Is the gentleman interested in no. 503?

Mr. YOUNG. It happens that I have the honor to be the chairman of the subcommittee that handled that bill, and I think 503 is without question the most meritorious bill that has been passed out of the War Claims Committee during this session. In this case a little boy, 12 years old, a mere child, at Camp Wadsworth, at Spartanburg, S.C., got hold of a hand grenade, carelessly left there by some soldiers.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. There is no question about the liability.

Mr. YOUNG. It is a meritorious case.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. It is a question of the amount. The actual loss here was two fingers and a thumb. There was a temporary injury to the eye. No State compensation board would pay $5,000 for such an injury, and no jury would return a verdict for that amount unless there happened to be a great deal of sympathy involved.

Mr. BLANTON. Five thousand dollars is the amount of a death claim that we have agreed upon.

Mr. YOUNG. Had this little fellow been killed by the explosion the pecuniary loss would probably amount to only $1,500, but, as a matter of fact, he lost his thumb and two fingers. They were obliterated from one hand. His eyes were slightly injured.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me to make a statement?

Mr. YOUNG. Yes.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. The gentleman from Illinois had a claim in here wherein a hand grenade exploded and crippled a boy for life, damaging one hand, and he asked only $2,500.

Mr. YOUNG. This claim came to the committee for $10,000. It was cut down to $7,500, and we cut it down to $5,000.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman did not cut it low enough. If the gentleman will cut it down to $2,500, we will help him pass the bill. That is the maximum amount allowed for a claim of this kind.

Mr. YOUNG. If the gentleman insists upon that, I shall accept the compromise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Ernest Elmore Hall, of Asheville, N.C., the sum of $7,500. Such sum shall be in full satisfaction of all claims against the United States for damages resulting from injuries to Ernest Elmore Hall, who lost a thumb and two fingers from the explosion in his hand of a hand grenade which was left at or near Camp Wadsworth, Spartanburg, S.C., on November 22, 1919.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 6, strike out "$7,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Amend the committee amendment by striking out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HOPE: At the end of the bill strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

WILLIAM J. COCKE

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 3179, for the relief of William J. Cocke.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. TRUAX. I object to that request. Will the gentleman withhold his request for a moment?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. I want to say to the Members of this House that, in my judgment, this is one of the "lousiest" bills that has ever been put on this calendar.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman withhold his request. I know this man Shipley and I know that it is not a "lousy" bill. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice until Mr. GUYER can be here.

Mr. TRUAX. I am asking the gentleman to withhold that request. Otherwise I shall have to object to the bill. There was some justification for my remark because this bill concerns hogs, and hogs are sometimes lousy.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice, to be called up at the next call of the Private Calendar. At that time the gentleman from Ohio will have an opportunity to quiz the gentleman from Kansas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK]?

There was no objection.

CHARLES P. SHIPLEY SADDLERY & MERCANTILE CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4573, for the relief of Charles P. Shipley Saddlery & Mercantile Co.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Will the gentleman withhold that? Mr. GUYER may be here a little later. I ask unanimous consent that this be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the consideration of this bill be deferred until later during the evening session.

Mr. TRUAX. I object to that.

Mr. BLANTON. When the claimant first presented this matter, he claimed $17,000. Now he claims $11,000. He had no proof whatever for the $17,000.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman has no objections to the bill's going over?

Mr. BLANTON. Let it go over generally.

Mr. HOPE. I have no objection to that procedure.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

R. S. HOWARD CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7561, for the relief of R. S. Howard Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a similar Senate bill (S. 2002) be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,827.51 to R. S. Howard Co., Inc., of New York City, as just compensation and in full settlement and satisfaction of the damages and/or losses incurred and suffered by it in complying with United States Navy order no. N-3255, dated June 18, 1918.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear and adjudicate, without regard to existing statutes of limitations, the claim of R. S. Howard Co., for just compensation arising out of the service upon said company of United States Navy commandeer order no. N-3255, dated June 18, 1918, with the same right as in other cases to either party to apply to the Supreme Court of the United States for writ of certiorari to review any judgment that may be rendered."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

A. C. MESSLER CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 503, to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of A. C. Messler Co.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

DELAWARE BAY SHIPBUILDING CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 189, for the relief of the Delaware Bay Shipbuilding Co.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

C. V. MASON

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 1354, for the relief of C. V. Mason.

There being no objection the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to C. V. Mason, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,206.76, representing expenses incurred by him as a result of the death and burial of his son, Dwight D. Mason, who died as a result of injuries received while employed as a teacher of manual training at Kanakanak Industrial School in Alaska on December 30, 1931.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "appropriated" insert "and in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States", and page 2, line 2, after the figures "1931" strike out the period, insert a colon, and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SANFORD & BROOKS CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 2042, for the relief of Sanford & Brooks Co.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand this bill is for the refund of income taxes.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; in the amount of $53,208.49.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is Andrew Mellon connected with it?

Mr. TRUAX. If Mellon did not recommend that it be refunded then there is not the ghost of a show for anybody else to get it through; so I object, Mr. Speaker.

W. H. LE DUC

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4999, for the relief of W. H. Le Duc.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. BYRNS]. The Chair is informed that there is a similar Senate bill on the Clerk's desk. Without objection, the Senate bill will be substituted for the House bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to W. H. Le Duc the sum of $1,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 percent per annum from the date of payment of fine or penalty, representing the amount deposited by him on account of a fine or penalty of $1,000 assessed against him and by him paid to the United States under protest at the Port of Galveston on or about March 26, 1928, for alleged violation of the navigation laws: Provided, That such sum shall be in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States: Provided further, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider and a similar House bill were laid on the table.

NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5408, to provide for the reimbursement of personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps for personal property lost, damaged, or destroyed as a result of the earthquake which occurred at Managua, Nicaragua, on March 31, 1931.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ANNIE M. AYER

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7828, for the relief of Annie M. Ayer.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JAMES M. PACE

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 8035, for the relief of James M. Pace.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Illinois state why this claim has not been paid before? This loss occurred back in 1929.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio that under the rules of the Post Office Department there is no way for the account of a postmaster to be credited except by an act of Congress.

Mr. TRUAX. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. This bill passed the House on at least two occasions, if not three, but failed of passage in the Senate not because of any opposition to it but just because of the fact it was not reached on the Senate Calendar.

Mr. TRUAX. And the Postmaster General recommends the passage of the bill?

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. He does. The bill really is for the relief of the claimant's estate, for Mr. Pace has died and his entire estate is being held up pending the adjudication of this loss.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Did he actually have to pay this money before his death?

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. I do not understand so. As I understand, it is just a claim that has been filed, but it is holding up the final disposition of this man's estate in the probate court.

Mr. TRUAX. Is the gentleman willing to accept the usual attorney-fee proviso?

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Absolutely; there is no attorney involved in the case.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill appropriates $21,476.99 to reimburse a postmaster for postage stamps burglarized from a post office. It is just one of many such bills. I do not intend to object to it, because there is here proof of loss; but our Post Office Department ought to take steps right now to stop carelessness that is causing many such losses.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, if that course is pursued, I object.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman withhold his objection to permit a further explanation?

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman over there from California [Mr. CARTER], who perhaps has a little bill to pass, cannot sit here without getting impatient when one of us who really work hard on the Private Calendar wants to say something, then I am going to see that our rights are protected.

Mr. SABATH. But why should the gentleman take it out on the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CARTER of California. Out of deference to the gentleman from Illinois I withdraw my demand for the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I shall finish my statement, after which I will withdraw my reservation of objection.

I say that the Post Office Department ought to take steps now to see that the postmasters all over the United States are duly warned and admonished to handle their stamps and money more carefully. There are literally hundreds of similar claims introduced every Congress for losses growing out of burglaries, some real and some not so real. There is too much carelessness and too much indifference.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit James M. Pace, former postmaster at Macomb, McDonough County, Ill., in his accounts with the sum of $21,476.99, the amount of money and postage stamps lost in the burglary of the post office at Macomb, Ill., on April 5, 1929.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PETER PIERRE

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 512, for the relief of Peter Pierre.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $45 to Peter Pierre, in payment for a horse which was lost while being used to transport supplies to a forest fire on the Flathead Indian Reservation, State of Montana.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHARLES L. GRAVES

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 690, for the relief of Charles L. Graves.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill involves an appropriation of $51,277, and I think that is too large a sum to be considered on the Private Calendar; therefore I object.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TRUAX. Yes.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand this claim, the agent on this reservation actually bought the sheep, but did not comply with certain technicalities. The sheep were actually delivered. It does not make any difference whether there is $5 or $50,000 involved. The Department of the Interior has investigated and Secretary Ickes recommends that this bill be passed.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman would pass anything that Secretary Ickes recommends?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. No; but he states that the Indians got the sheep, that they were good sheep, and, I think, fat sheep, and maybe a pig or two.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman ought not to make that request in a case of this kind. I am not interested in the bill. It is a question of whether you deliver the sheep or money. This fellow cut the red tape and spent the money, but the sheep were delivered.

Mr. BLANTON. And the Comptroller General held it up on a technicality. He spent the money, spent it honestly, and I think he ought to be paid.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the bill?

Mr. TRUAX. I object.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection to the unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be passed over.

JAMES R. YOUNG

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1089, for the relief of James O. Young.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

M. M. TWICHEL

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1126, for the relief of M. M. Twichel.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to M. M. Twichel, of St. Ignatius, Mont., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,433.34 in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for compensation for services rendered and expenses incurred in connection with the burial of Indians on the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont., prior to May 1, 1933.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the usual attorney's fee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOPE: On page 1, line 9, after the figures "1933", insert the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANTHONY J. LYNN

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1429, for the relief of Anthony J. Lynn.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. May I ask the gentleman to reserve his objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I reserve the objection.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I think the objection is offered because the man was a criminal, but I think the testimony in the case shows that he was put in jail on false evidence, which was later proven to be false, and the Government admits it was false.

Mr. TRUAX. In this case the claimant was convicted in Siberia of burglary and sentenced to 10 years at hard labor. The conviction was on May 27, 1919. Subsequently it developed that the testimony on which he was convicted was untrue and he was restored to duty by Presidential order on October 24, 1919. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Anthony J. Lynn, formerly a private, Company G, Thirty-first Regiment United States Infantry, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $254.40, said sum representing the whole amount of pay and allowances of which he was deprived by reason of proceedings against him in 1919 on false charges of burglary and the sentence of courtmartial rendered in such proceedings.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WESTERN MONTANA CLINIC

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1772, for the relief of the Western Montana Clinic, Missoula, Mont.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to the Western Montana Clinic, of Missoula, Mont., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,022.30 in full satisfaction of its claim against the United States for surgical and medical services rendered prior to May 30, 1932, to Indians on the Flathead Indian Reservation, Mont.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

STELIO VASSILIADIS

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7916, to authorize an appropriation for the reimbursement of Stelio Vassiliadis.

Mr. HENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill S. 2748 be substituted for the House bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman to explain the bill?

Mr. HENNEY. This is a very small bill, as will be noted. The amount involved is $406, and is for the reimbursement of Stelio Vassiliadis, who was at that time vice consul at Kiev. In 1918, during the war, the American consul, Mr. Jenkins, was removed from there because of war conditions, and he turned over the American consul duties to the Spanish vice consul at that location, who incurred a bill amounting to 440 gold rubles. At that time the American consul turned over to him 50 gold rubles, equivalent to 300 paper rubles, leaving a balance of 790 gold rubles, or $406, due the Spanish vice consul for expenses incurred in caring for the American post for 2 years, March 1, 1918, to March 1, 1920.

This bill was first introduced in 1926 and has gone back and forth all this time. The bill has the O.K. of the State Department and a letter from President Roosevelt requesting that it be paid.

Mr. McFARLANE. This is a war bill, and I was wondering why it was so late in getting here.

Mr. HENNEY. This was because of delay in getting the papers validated by the State Department.

Mr. SABATH. The State Department's O.K. was required.

Mr. McFARLANE. It does not take 15 years to get the O.K. of the State Department?

Mr. SABATH. Surely; under a Republican administration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to Stelio Vassiliadis the sum of $406.53, being the equivalent of 790 gold rubles at $0.5146 to the ruble, for the reimbursement of certain expenditures made by him as vice consul of Spain at Kiev, Russia, in representing the interests of the United States at that post from March 1, 1918, to the end of February 1920.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

J. M. DOOLEY FIREPROOF WAREHOUSE CORPORATION

The clerk called the next bill, S. 489, for the relief of the J. M. Dooley Fireproof Warehouse Corporation, of Brooklyn, N.Y.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ROBERT RAYFORD WILCOXSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5809, to provide compensation for Robert Rayford Wilcoxson for injuries received in citizens' military training camp.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman whether he is familiar with the physical condition of this claimant at the present time?

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Only from the evidence submitted to our subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does the gentleman recall how he arrived at the sum of $150 as representing this man's earnings?

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Upon the recommendation of the War Department. This was the smallest amount that the War Department could use, we were informed by the Secretary, in fixing the amount which the United States Employees' Compensation Commission should consider in the matter. The bill has been amended in accordance with the suggestion of the War Department.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Did the Military Affairs Committee unanimously recommend this bill?

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. If I remember correctly, yes, it did.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I am going to object to this bill for the reason that I do not believe the United States Employees' Compensation Commission should pay any damages for injuries received in military camps.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. I may say to the gentleman from Washington that these young men come out, as I see it, and offer their services in order to prepare themselves for war service, and there is no arm of the Federal Government that can take care of these young men in the event they are injured.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Why do not the appropriations of the Army take care of these cases?

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Existing law does not permit that.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. We can pass a law to take care of that.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. We have to meet a condition here. This man gave his life in order to prepare himself to serve his country in the event of an emergency.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I am willing to work with the gentleman in the preparation of a bill to take care of these cases as a general matter, but I can see no justification for the United States Employees' Compensation Commission paying for injuries occurring on military reservations.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Let me remind the gentleman that this boy is a civilian, and in such cases these young men are only there for a couple of weeks carrying out the program of these citizens' military training camps.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. He came in voluntarily; but it is still war activity.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. It is in preparation for war.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. I may say to the gentleman that all the bills with respect to the few injuries that have happened in the citizens' military training camps have been handled in this way in previous Congresses. There is one case exactly similar to this where a bill was passed in the Seventieth Congress. The reason there is no general law from the Military Affairs Committee is because there are so few accidents, and the War Department has suggested putting this up to the Compensation Commission as the only way relief can be had.

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. So far as I know, there are only two such cases before the Military Affairs Committee of all the fellows who went into the citizens' military training camps and the officers' training camps.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and in full settlement against the United States, to Robert Rayford Wilcoxson, of Lawrenceburg, Tenn., the sum of $20 per month because of physical injury and damages sustained by him while at the citizens' military training camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., on June 20, 1931.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to apply and extend the provisions, benefits, and privileges of the act entitled 'An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes' approved September 7, 1916, as amended, to the case of Robert Rayford Wilcoxson on account of injury suffered by him on June 20, 1931, while a student at the citizens' military training camp at Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., effective from said June 20, 1931: Provided, That, for the purposes of this act, the pay and allowances of said Robert Rayford Wilcoxson at the time of his said injury shall be considered as having been $150 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HARRY H. HORTON

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 308, to authorize the award of a decoration for distinguished service to Harry H. Horton.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Military Affairs Committee is shortly going to bring out a bill that will touch upon general legislation of this kind, and I think it would be unfair to pass a bill here tonight when other bills have been held up in the committee waiting for this general bill to be considered. I reserved my rights in committee when this bill was reported, and I was going to ask that it go over without prejudice to see if the committee does report such a general bill.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that under the law today we must extend the time for the consideration of awards of decorations, and the subcommittee has a bill coming up before the main committee next Tuesday on this very subject. We will be making fish out of one and fowl out of another if we take these bills up haphazardly.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. May I ask the gentleman if this bill is not favorably reported by his committee?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Would the gentleman do a soldier an injustice by not passing this bill?

Mr. GOSS. I may say to the gentleman that we have held up bills of other Members awaiting general legislation extending the time in the War Department so as to allow all to come in under a general law and the War Department has recommended against this bill for that reason.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. There appears to be a disposition to pass this bill now and the gentleman has no assurance that the other legislation which has been proposed will be enacted into law.

Mr. GOSS. I may say to the gentleman that there are members of the committee on the floor here who can vouch for the statement that we have held up every other bill in the Military Affairs Committee awaiting the establishment of this policy.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. There must have been an unusual situation which prompted the committee to report out this bill.

Mr. GOSS. I reserved my rights in committee pending the consideration of this general bill.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Connecticut that in my judgment this is one of the most meritorious bills that has ever been presented on this floor. This is to award a decoration to a buck private for service in the World War. This private was hit by a shell in a dugout and the lower part of his face blown away, and the surgeons, by a remarkable operation in the grafting of bone, have restored this man's jaw.

It is an outstanding example of bone surgery in the United States today. Here is a chance to do something for the men in the trenches, and not be always awarding medals to officers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GOSS. I object.

CARL L. BERNAU

The Clerk called the next bill on the calendar, H.R. 3980, for the relief of Carl L. Bernau.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HOPE. I object.

UNION SHIPPING & TRADING CO., LTD.

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 1192, for the relief of the Union Shipping & Trading Co., Ltd.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BLAND. This is a bill to submit this claim to the Court of Claims. I can see that there might appear to be a reason for an objection, if the statements of the people who were on the American ship were not permitted to be submitted in evidence, but the bill permits that. I have no constituents interested in the matter, but I have made inquiry as to when the Berwind was destroyed.

Mr. TRUAX. Is it not a fact that this claim for damage goes back to April 1918?

Mr. BLAND. Yes. It was in April 1918 that the collision occurred, and it was in August 1918 that the American ship Berwind and all on board were destroyed. The statement of the United States officials at the time led these people to believe that there would be no defense to the claim.

Mr. TRUAX. This is for the relief of a British corporation, is it not?

Mr. BLAND. Yes; it is for a British corporation, but I want to give them justice.

Mr. TRUAX. We should give the American people their just dues first.

Mr. SABATH. That is just what the gentleman from Virginia is asking for.

Mr. TRUAX. I am looking after the American interests.

Mr. BLAND. I am trying to give every man his rights.

Mr. TRUAX. I am for this country first, last, and all the time and, Mr. Speaker, I object.

ST. LUDGERS CATHOLIC CHURCH OF GERMANTOWN, MO.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H.R. 3595, for the relief of St. Ludgers Catholic Church of Germantown, Henry County, Mo.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Reserving the right to object, I should like to find out what the actual damage was here.

Mr. DICKINSON. The actual damage was more than is asked for in this bill—more than the amount fixed by the committee. This bill has been reported time and again. I introduced this bill 20 years ago, and it has been reported out of the committee time and again.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, most of the older Members here know this case has been thoroughly investigated, and everyone who investigated it decided that it was a meritorious bill. I do not see why there should be any objection to it. It is a good bill; the damage was nearly twice as much as they ask for in this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to St. Ludgers Catholic Church at Germantown, county of Henry, and State of Missouri, the sum of $3,000, in full compensation for the use and occupation of, and incidental damage to, St. Ludgers Catholic Church at Germantown by the United States Army during the Civil War.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

OSCAR C. OLSON

The Clerk called the bill, H.R. 4175, for the relief of Oscar C. Olson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

GUY GOODWIN

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4180, for the relief of Guy Goodwin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

OSCAR C. OLSON

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Why does not the gentleman wait until half past 9. We will all be ready to adjourn by 10 o'clock.

Mr. PEAVEY. But I want to return to a bill that was objected to, H.R. 4175.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman should not do that.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment?

Mr. PEAVEY. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 532, a bill for the relief of Oscar C. Olson, just objected to.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the bill?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. It is immaterial, if there is no objection after we get through.

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is a bill called up by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PEAVEY], and I think we better return to it if we do not want a point of order raised.

Mr. TRUAX. Let him raise the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. If that policy is pursued, then every time a member has his bill objected to he will make a point of order of no quorum.

Mr. BLANCHARD. But the gentleman from Wisconsin was on his feet asking for recognition, but he was not recognized by the Chair.

Mr. BLANTON. I think he should be permitted to offer an explanation. I ask unanimous consent that we return to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to returning to the bill (H.R. 4175)?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the Treasury of the United States, from any money not otherwise appropriated, to Oscar C. Olson, the sum of $52.50, being compensation for loss on May 23, 1918, of his personal effects, baggage, and clothing while en route to France on the British ship Moldarra, under military orders, when said ship was torpedoed and sunk in the English Channel.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, the only objection that I have ever heard to this bill is because of the smallness of the amount asked. The reason the bill comes before the House is this. On several occasions the House has passed bills similar to this. This man lost his property, and his money, and the things he took with him necessary to his service in France when his vessel was sunk in the English Channel. He saw notices in the newspapers after that about receiving compensation, and it is the first time he ever knew he was entitled to recover anything. He sent the matter to me and I introduced the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. And it involves only $52?

Mr. PEAVEY. That is all.

Mr. TRUAX. There is no recommendation for it from the War Department.

Mr. PEAVEY. The War Department makes no recommendation one way or the other.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEAVEY. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. The only objection here was the fact that this man waited for 18 years before filing any claim. I think the explanation that the gentleman has given is a reasonable one. He did not know that he was entitled to anything. In view of that fact I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

MACK COPPER CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6245, conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of the Mack Copper Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill involves $229,500 and I object. Such a bill should not be passed without reading, as $229,500 is quite a large sum of money. I object.

VELIE MOTORS CORPORATION

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6349, to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of the Velie Motors Corporation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DAVID A. WRIGHT

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7389, granting jurisdiction to the Court of Claims to hear the case of David A. Wright.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, this is another bill that seeks to cancel the statute of limitations for the purpose of hearing a claim in the Court of Claims, for an implied contract made in 1918 with officers of the Ordnance Department.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is correct. It is a bill asking to give jurisdiction to the Court of Claims. This is not a bill, however, that seeks to mulct the Treasury of the United States out of a dollar. The fact is that this is an individual that never received a dollar out of the contract which he made with the Government at that time.

Mr. TRUAX. Is that what this claim is for, some profit that he should have received?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is to repay him for actual expenses that he had on account of preparation in fitting up a factory, renovating a factory and placing machinery in it in preparation for the manufacture of tool machines. The fact is he never got a dollar out of it, and as a result of the contract which he entered into he is today down on a little patch of land in the Ozarks of Missouri, entirely bankrupt. That is the fact of the matter.

Mr. TRUAX. I call attention to the fact that during the war the farmers also had implied contracts to raise more wheat, and they did raise more wheat, and they are all bankrupt today. What are we going to do for them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. He entered into this contract with the authorized agents of the Government.

Mr. TRUAX. The farmers entered into contracts with Mr. Hoover to raise more wheat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He entered into a contract with the representatives of the Ordnance Department of the War Department.

Mr. TRUAX. The War Department recommends against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The War Department recommends against it for this reason: They say that the War Claims Board which was set up found against it. The fact is they did find against him, but it was because of the fact that they would not permit this claimant to submit evidence at all.

Mr. TRUAX. That was 16 years ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was 16 years ago; yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Why has not this bill been passed before?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was presented to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims heard it and passed upon the merits and found that he had a meritorious claim, but denied the claim for the reason that he did not have a technical right under the law——

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

COHOES HISTORICAL SOCIETY, NEW YORK

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 387, donating bronze trophy guns to the Cohoes Historical Society, Cohoes, N.Y.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to deliver to the order of the Cohoes Historical Society two bronze trophy guns stored in the Watervliet Arsenal at Watervliet, N.Y., and marked "W. A. 240" and "W. A. 241", caliber, 4.125: Provided, That the United States shall be put to no expense in connection with the delivery of said guns.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JAMES HENRY GREEN

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6497, for the relief of James Henry Green.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers James Henry Green, deceased, who was a member of the Forty-third Ohio Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 9th day of April 1865: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GROSSE POINT LIGHTHOUSE RESERVATION, ILL.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7863, authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to dispose of part of the Grosse Point Lighthouse Reservation, Ill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CHARLES E. DAGENETT

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 7560, for the relief of Charles E. Dagenett.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the General Accounting Office is hereby authorized to credit the accounts of Charles E. Dagenett, supervisor of Indian employment and special disbursing officer (retired), in the sum of $125.56, representing funds expended by him, in that sum, for telephone tolls, lodging, traveling expenses, etc., for himself and others in connection with work under his supervision.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed; a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INDIANS OF THE FORT PECK RESERVATION, MONT.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 8074, for the relief of certain Indians of the Fort Peck Reservation, Mont.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a similar Senate bill (S. 2889) will be substituted for the House bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following-named Indians of the Fort Peck Reservation the amounts herein set forth: James Black Dog, $185; Archie Red Elk, $25; Catherine Medicine Walk and Belle Medicine Walk, $25; James Garfield, $70; Nancy Titus, $35; and Carl W. Eagle, administrator of the estate of Charles Peterson, $25; the above sums representing funds collected for the Indians named, but misapplied by a former employee of the Indian Service.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS HOSPITAL, LTD.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 471, for the relief of Physicians and Surgeons Hospital, Ltd.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand the matter, the Navy Department has no objection to the payment of the hospitalization, but does object to the amount of $204.14.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, that is not the issue, I may say to the gentleman from Washington. There is really no objection on the part of the Navy Department. It is a bill that should be paid.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I understand they object to the amount. They did not assume liabiilty for these men.

Mr. EVANS. No; the amount is not questioned. The circumstances were something like this: These two enlisted men of the Navy were injured in an automobile accident near this hospital out in San Fernando Valley. They were taken to the hospital. The surgeon called up the ship to which these boys were attached.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. May I call the gentleman's attention to page 2 of the report, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, dated February 25, 1933, in which the following statement is made:

In view of the foregoing the Navy Department does not recommend that the bill H.R. 14285 be enacted until the amount stated therein is reduced to a proper sum.

Mr. EVANS. I do not remember that; but it seems to me a bill for $204 is very reasonable. This boy's legs were cut off and he was in this hospital for several weeks.

I wonder if we are talking about the same bill?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I am sure we are.

Mr. EVANS. The number of this bill is H.R. 471.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I am looking at the report on that bill; I read a statement from it setting forth the views of the Acting Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. EVANS. This boy was enlisted in the Navy and was treated by the Physicians and Surgeons Hospital.

Mr. BLANTON. This is Calendar No. 546, H.R. 471. The report states that the boy's right leg was amputated. The Navy Department states that in view of the foregoing the Navy Department does not recommend that the bill be enacted until the amount thereof is reduced to a proper sum.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I suggest that the gentleman accept an amendment reducing the amount to $150.

Mr. EVANS. I feel it is very unjust, but under the circumstances I shall have to accept the amendment.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Physicians and Surgeons Hospital, Ltd., Glendale, Calif., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $204.14 in full settlement for professional services rendered Wilfred Henry Engel for injuries sustained in a motorcycle accident on or about January 15, 1931, said services having been authorized by a naval officer: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "settlement", insert the words "of all claims against the Government of the United States."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIONCHECK: Page 1, line 7, strike out "$204.11" and insert in lieu thereof "$150."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLARENCE A. WIMLEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 1306, for the relief of Clarence A. Wimley.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Clarence A. Wimley, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 for personal injuries resulting from a collision between a taxicab in which he was a passenger and a Navy bus on October 26, 1930.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$100 in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

Page 1, line 9, strike out "26" and insert "29."

Page 1, line 10, add the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN PARKER CLARK, SR.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 1308, for the relief of John Parker Clark, Sr.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John Parker Clark, Sr., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $11,325 for personal and property loss resulting from collision with Army vehicle near Freehold, N.J., on the night of October 26, 1929.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 6, strike out "$11,325" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000 in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States"; and on page 1, line 10, after the figures "1929", insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ARTHUR A. BURN, SR., AND J. K. RYLAND

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 487, the bill (H.R. 7631) for the relief of Arthur A. Burn, Sr., and J. K. Ryland. I make this request because on this bill I demanded the regular order, and I understand the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McMILLAN] did not have an opportunity to make some explanation which he desired to make in reference to his bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object to that request at this time. As soon as we get through a few more bills, I will not object to the request being made.

Mr. CARTER of California. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my unanimous-consent request and will renew it later.

JOHN PARKER CLARK, JR.

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 1345, for the relief of John Parker Clark, Jr.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay John Parker Clark, Jr., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,325.72 for personal injuries resulting from a collision with Army vehicle near Freehold, N.J., on the night of October 26, 1929.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 6, strike out "$5,325.72" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500 in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States"; and on page 1, line 10, after the figures "1929", insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BERTHA A. BISHOP

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 1794, for the relief of Bertha A. Bishop.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BAKEWELL. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. TRUAX. I withhold my objection.

Mr. BAKEWELL. I wish the gentleman would explain his objection to this bill.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. This man's death occurred 21 years after the fall, and there is hardly any casual connection between the man's death and a fall 21 years previously.

Mr. TRUAX. The Secretary of Commerce and the Commissioner of Lighthouses both recommend against the bill on the ground that there is no casual connection.

Mr. BAKEWELL. I think the gentleman is mistaken, and I wish he would withdraw his objection. The evidence is very clear that this man was crippled from the moment of his fall and that he performed his duties with pain and very much difficulty for some 5 years after his fall.

Mr. McFARLANE. What was the nature of his injury?

Mr. BAKEWELL. It was a spinal injury and is fully described on the first page of the report. He was thrown from the lighthouse by the swinging of the lamp and fell some 10 feet and was never able to move about freely afterward. For 5 years he continued to drag himself up to the lighthouse.

There was no compensation insurance in force at the time. There seems to be every reason why in the interest of justice this claim should be recognized. Secretary Roper does not advise against it, and he does not advise for it.

Mr. TRUAX. Does not the gentleman believe that the Department has gone into this case thoroughly, as they do in all such cases, and that when they recommend against the enactment of a bill this Congress ought to be guided by their investigation, judgment, and decision?

Mr. BAKEWELL. No; because it will be noticed in the statement upon which Mr. Roper bases his comment that the records do not show that Mr. Bishop reported the injury. Of course, he did not report the injury. There was no compensation law in effect at that time. He carried on his duties faithfully and diligently. There is even the statement that there is no evidence of his death, although you will find an affidavit in the statement following.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has made some statements here about affidavits and that they prove nothing.

Mr. BAKEWELL. What kind of proof would the gentleman require in a case of this kind?

Mr. TRUAX. I am willing to accept the decision of the Department which has conducted an investigation, and a fair one.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

C. J. MAST

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1949, for the relief of C. J. Mast.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MARY A. ROCKWELL

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 4387, for the relief of Mary A. Rockwell.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of Mary A. Rockwell on account of the death of her husband, Fred P. Rockwell, November 6, 1926, while employed by the Post Office Department as a railway mail clerk, in the same manner and to the same extent as if said Mary A. Rockwell had made application for the benefits of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916, as amended, within the 1-year period required by sections 17 and 20 thereof: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MAUDE G. NICHOLSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5064, to pay certain fees to Maude G. Nicholson, widow of George A. Nicholson, late a United States commissioner.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 3128) to pay certain fees to Maude G. Nicholson, widow of George A. Nicholson, late a United States commissioner, be substituted for the House bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Maude G. Nicholson, widow of George A. Nicholson, late a United States commissioner in the western district of New York, at Canandaigua, N.Y., the sum of $183.45 in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States for fees earned by said George A. Nicholson, notwithstanding his failure to file a statutory oath in accordance with the provisions of volume 44, United States Statutes, page 918, approved December 11, 1926, and volume 44, United States Statutes, page 1346, approved March 2, 1927: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider and a similar House bill were laid on the table.

THOMAS F. OLSEN

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5400, for the relief of Thomas F. Olsen.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of Thomas F. Olsen, postmaster at De Kalb, Ill., in the sum of $18,687.19. Such sum represents postal funds in the amount of $136.30 and postage-stamp stock in the amount of $18,550.89, which were lost in the burglary of the post office at De Kalb, Ill., on February 10, 1931, from no fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GERALD MACKEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5566, for the relief of Gerald Mackey.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Private Calendar No. 555 be passed over without prejudice for the reason that the proponent of the bill is not present.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I object, Mr. Speaker.

MARY BLACK CLINIC

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 5817, for the relief of the Mary Black Clinic.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a similar Senate bill will be substituted for the House bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, is the amount in the Senate bill the same as the amount in the House bill? The House bill has been reduced to $2,500.

The SPEAKER. The amount is the same.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill (S. 2969), as follows:

S. 2969

An act for the relief of the Mary Black Memorial Hospital

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Mary Black Memorial Hospital, Inc., of Spartanburg, S.C., the sum of $2,500.85, in full satisfaction of all claims of such hospital against the United States for expenses incurred in furnishing hospitalization and medical and surgical treatment to Paul Henry Manning, a fireman, second class, United States Navy, from October 16, 1931, to February 1, 1932, pursuant to a telegraphic authorization dated October 16, 1931, from the Naval Hospital, Norfolk, Va., such claim having been subsequently disallowed by the Comptroller General: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider and a similar House bill were laid on the table.

JOHN R. NOVAK

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6284, for the relief of John R. Novak.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have talked with the author of the bill about the amount involved. The bill carries the sum of $5,000, and I think in view of the age of the claimant this is entirely too much.

Mr. KOCIALKOWSKI. This family is in very desperate circumstances at this time and is being helped today by charity.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I appreciate that, but of course that does not change the rule which we have been following here in the House with reference to awards in cases of this character. If the gentleman is willing to cut the amount to $2,500, I shall have no objection.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I think about $3,500 or $4,000 would be fair.

Mr. KOCIALKOWSKI. Suppose we make it $4,500.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the gentleman will make it $3,500 I shall not object.

Mr. KOCIALKOWSKI. Make it $4,000.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I shall not bargain with the gentleman, and I am willing to agree to $4,000.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John R. Novak the sum of $10,000 as compensation for fatal injuries sustained by his daughter, La Verne Novak, by an automobile truck owned and operated by the Post Office Department, on February 20, 1932, at the northeast corner of Fulton and Green Streets, Chicago, Ill.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$10,000 as compensation" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000 in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

At the end of the bill insert: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment striking out $5,000 and inserting $4,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANCHARD: In line 6, page 1, of the committee amendment, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,000."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHARLES FARR

The Clerk called the next bill, H.R. 6625, for the relief of Charles Farr.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem in favor of Charles Farr, of Greeley, Colo., temporary coupon bond no. 156241, of the third Liberty loan of 1918, in the denomination of $1,000, with interest from March 15, 1920, to September 15, 1928, at the rate of 4¼ precent per annum, without presentation of the bond, said bond having been alleged to have been inadvertently destroyed by fire: Provided, That the said bond shall not have been previously presented to the Department: And provided further, That the said Charles Farr shall first file in the United States Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of such missing bond and of the interest thereon from March 15, 1920, to September 15, 1928, in such form and with such corporate surety as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the bond hereinbefore described.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "1918" and insert in lieu thereof "1928."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow to Nephew K. Clark, United States commissioner for the southern district of Georgia, Savannah division, the fees earned by him from March 29, 1933, to July 3, 1933, both dates inclusive, in performing the duties incident to the office of commissioner. HARRY H. HORTON

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to S. 308, to authorize the award of a decoration for distinguished service to Harry H. Horton.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I objected to this bill on the ground that the Military Affairs Committee was considering a bill that would cover this case in general legislation. It was reported this morning. I am withdrawing my objection, although I think the other bill will cover it. But my colleague [Mr. MALONEY] and the author of the bill and other gentlemen think it is wiser to let this bill take care of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to cause the recommendation for the award of a decoration to Harry H. Horton, formerly private, first class, Medical Detachment, One Hundred and Forty-eighth Regiment Field Artillery, American Expeditionary Forces, for distinguished conduct in the vicinity of Malancourt, near Montfaucon, France, on or about October 12, 1918, to be considered by the proper boards or authorities, and such award made to said Horton as his said conduct merits.

SANFORD & BROOKS CO.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, in the course of the evening objection was made to Calendar No. 511, H.R. 2042, for the relief of the Sanford & Brooks Co. I have received a request that the bill be passed over without prejudice. The author of the bill and the gentleman who reported it were not present at the time.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I objected to the bill, but I know of no reason why I should object to the request of the majority leader.

Mr. TRUAX. Reserving the right to object, is this a refund of income taxes?

Mr. BYRNS. I have no knowledge of what is in the bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will say that I do not think it is for the refund of income taxes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Burn, Sr., of Daufuskie Island, S.C., the sum of $5,000; and to J. K. Ryland, of Bermuda, Ala., the sum of $4,246.06, the same being in full satisfaction of any claim they may have against the United States Government on account of the death of Arthur A. Burn, Jr., and J. B. Ryland as a result of having been sent to sea in an admittedly unseaworthy boat or skiff while employed in the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey near St. Petersburg, Fla., February 3, 1926:

With the following committee amendment:

At the end of the bill, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. NEWARK, N.J., May 26, 1934.

Hon. W. WARREN BARBOUR,
United States Senate:

As chairman of New Jersey Council of American Legislators Association, am interested in House Joint Resolution 19, concerning Interstate Legislative Reference Bureau, which association maintains. Am informed it is now in Senate Committee on the Library, of which you are a member. Am familiar with work of bureau, make constant use of its services, and find it to be most helpful to me in my legislative work. Believe congressional support of bureau would be distinct advantage to all of us engaged in legislation. Would appreciate your aid to have Senate pass this resolution before your adjournment.

BRIDGE ACROSS HUDSON RIVER AT FIFTY-SEVENTH STREET, NEW YORK

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief telegram which I have received from Brig. Gen. George R. Dyer, of the Port of New York Authority, sent to me in opposition to Senate bill 3553. I ask that the telegram be appropriately referred.

NEW YORK, N.Y., May 25, 1934.

Senator W. WARREN BARBOUR,
Senate Office Building:

Request your strong opposition to Senate bill 3553, designed to overrule Secretary of War by creating commission to determine height of proposed private toll bridge across Hudson River at Fifty-seventh Street, New York. This bill will impair Public Works Administration loan of $37,000,000 for Midtown Hudson Tunnel now under construction by Port Authority in the immediate vicinity of the proposed bridge. Proposed bridge will burden local New Jersey communities and State highway commission with insuperable traffic problems. Proposed bridge is strongly opposed by War Department, Navy Department, leading commercial organizations, Sandy Hook pilots, and Regional Plan Association, as well as by the Port of New York Authority. Proposed bridge is private venture without public support. Urge bill be recommitted and hearings held thereon with adequate advance notice. Letter follows.

GEORGE R. DYER,
Chairman the Port of New York Authority.

INVESTIGATION OF AMERICAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.

Mr. DILL submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 252), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

[S.Res. 252, 73d Cong., 2d sess.]

Resolution

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to make a thorough and complete investigation of the operations, relationships, and activities of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., its subsidiaries, affiliates, associates, and other concerns in which it or they have any direct or indirect, financial interest, or which have any such interest in it, or in which any of its officers or directors hold any office or exert any control and shall report to the Senate the facts as ascertained and make recommendations for such legislation as the committee deems desirable.

In making said investigation the committee shall, among other things, investigate and report particularly on the following subjects:

(1) The financial structure and relationship of the company and its subsidiaries, associates, and affiliates and the extent to which its holding-company structure enables it to evade regulation or taxation, or enables it to conceal or absorb profits; the extent of interservice contracts or transactions between the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. and its subsidiary, affiliated, associated, or holding companies, and particularly contracts with the Western Electric Co. and other manufacturers of electrical communication equipment, if any; also the sale prices of telephone equipment, material, or devices to telephone-operating companies, the profits upon such sales and the effect of such sales upon the rate base of operating companies when used as a basis for telephone charges in the various States; and the probable savings by telephone-operating companies purchasing equipment under a system of competitive bidding.

(2) The activities of and expansion by the company and its subsidiaries, associates, holding companies, and affiliates into fields other than telephone communication, including teletype service, telephoto service, broadcasting, motion-picture distribution, and the manufacture of electrical equipment.

(3) The methods of competition with other companies and industries, with reference to equality of service, reasonableness of rates, both local and long distance, depreciation accounting practices, discriminatory practices, suppression of patents, method of accounting for royalties accruing on patents, sale and refusal to sell equipment to competing companies, maintenance of exorbitantly high prices because of monopolistic control, and particularly the relationship of the company with Electrical Research Products, Inc., and its relation to independent motion-picture organizations, and its practices in the interests of the company.

(4) The extent to which local subscribers have borne the cost of the research developments for long-distance appliances, radio, motion-picture, and other inventions not related to the improvement of local service.

(5) The reasons for voluntary reductions in long-distance charges and the failure to reduce local charges during the past few years of generally falling prices.

(6) Its relations as an employer with its employees and the extent of its reduction in number and wages of employees while maintaining exorbitant salaries for high officials and a continuous high dividend rate.

(7) The methods whereby the company or its subsidiaries or affiliates or its officers or directors have sought through propaganda, or the expenditure of money or the control of channels of publicity, to influence or control public opinion or elections.

The words "associates", "subsidiaries", "affiliates", and "holding companies" shall include all companies directly or indirectly associated or connected with the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., either by stock ownership, interlocking directorates, interlocking offices, whether by direct or indirect stock ownership, office holding, or directorates, or traceable through one or more companies, corporations, partnerships, individuals, or in any other manner.

That the said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpenas or otherwise; to require the production or inspection of all accounts, books, papers, documents, memoranda, minutes, etc.; and to employ counsel, experts, and other assistants, and stenographers at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpenas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee, or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation, shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, not to exceed $25,000.

TREATY WITH CUBA

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably without amendment the Cuban Treaty. The report is unanimous, although there was no record vote. As in executive session, I ask unanimous consent to have the treaty read, to see if there is objection to its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for what?

Mr. PITTMAN. As in executive session, that we proceed to the consideration of the treaty, but I ask to have the treaty read first.

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. McNARY rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I was going to suggest that I thought it would be appropriate to call for a quorum. I myself have no objection to the treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no objection to a quorum being called.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is what I was going to suggest. I make the point that a quorum is not present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Hebert	Pope
Ashurst	Couzens	Johnson	Reynolds
Austin	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] because of illness. I announce further the absence of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN], officially attending memorial services at Gettysburg. I also announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], occasioned by official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the time the quorum was called, the Chair will state to the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] had sent to the desk and asked to have read a treaty with Cuba for the purpose, as the Chair understands, of consideration at this time. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is the request not only to read the treaty but to have action upon it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair assumes that that is the purpose for which the Senator from Nevada desired to have the treaty read.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like to have the treaty read first, and then, if there be no objection, to have it considered.

Mr. McNARY. It will be useless to read it, if there is going to be objection. I think we should anticipate that situation in order to expedite consideration. The treaty was sent to the Senate last evening and referred to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and this morning was reported. I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada, was there a division among the members of the committee?

Mr. PITTMAN. There was no division. I wish to say that there were two Senators who said that they had no objection, though they doubted the effect of the treaty; but the action of the committee was unanimous.

Mr. McNARY. Personally I have no objection to the present consideration of the treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the treaty.

The legislative clerk read the treaty, as follows:

The United States of America and the Republic of Cuba, being animated by the desire to fortify the relations of friendship between the two countries and to modify, with

All the acts effected in Cuba by the United States of America during its military operation of the island, up to May 20, 1902, the date on which the Republic of Cuba was established, have been ratified and held as valid; and all the rights legally acquired by virtue of those acts shall be maintained and protected.

ARTICLE III

Until the two contracting parties agree to the modification or abrogation of the stipulations of the agreement in regard to the lease to the United States of America of lands in Cuba for coaling and naval stations signed by the President of the Republic of Cuba on February 16, 1903, and by the President of the United States of America on the 23d day of the same month and year, the stipulations of that agreement with regard to the naval station of Guantánamo shall continue in effect. The supplementary agreement in regard to naval or coaling stations signed between the two Governments on July 2, 1903, also shall continue in effect in the same form and on the same conditions with respect to the naval station at Guantánamo. So long as the United States of America shall not abandon the said naval station of Guantánamo or the two Governments shall not agree to a modification of its present limits, the station shall continue to have the territorial area that it now has, with the limits that it has on the date of the signature of the present Treaty.

ARTICLE IV

If at any time in the future a situation should arise that appears to point to an outbreak of contagious disease in the territory of either of the contracting parties, either of the two Governments shall, for its own protection, and without its act being considered unfriendly, exercise freely and at its discretion the right to suspend communications between those of its ports that it may designate and all or part of the territory of the other party, and for the period that it may consider to be advisable.

ARTICLE V

The present Treaty shall be ratified by the contracting parties in accordance with their respective constitutional methods; and shall go into effect on the date of the exchange of their ratifications, which shall take place in the city of Washington as soon as possible.

In faith whereof, the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty and have affixed their seals hereto.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to be heard a few minutes on the Latin-American situation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, in view of the pendency of the tariff bill, if the Senator is going to speak on another subject, I will have to withdraw my request.

Mr. LONG. I have the floor, I understand, Mr. President, and I do not care to yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. I do not care to yield, and I decline to yield. I repeat that I want to be heard for a few minutes on the Latin-American situation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I merely asked to have the treaty read as preliminary to a request which I intended to submit for unanimous consent. The treaty has been read, but I do not make the request that the treaty be now considered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. LONG. I will yield for a question only.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation. The unfinished business at the present time is the tariff bill. Any Senator may obtain the floor on the tariff bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, if any Senator obtains the floor now the time he consumes will be taken out of his time on the tariff bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He would have 20 minutes to discuss the bill and 15 minutes to discuss any amendment that might be pending, except the agricultural amendments upon which he would have 1 hour.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the last thing I would try to do, as the Senator from Louisiana knows, would be to deprive any Senator of the floor, and I could not do so if I wished. But there are one or two resolutions, rather formal in their nature and very important, which should be considered, one of which relates to procedure in impeachment trials. I inquire of the Senator from Louisiana if he will yield for 10 or 12 minutes so that we may endeavor to dispose of two resolutions which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] desires to have considered and a resolution on the table for which I shall ask consideration?

Mr. LONG. If there is no objection to my yielding for that purpose and provided I do not lose the floor, I shall be glad to do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana will be recognized when the unfinished business shall again be laid before the Senate.

INVESTIGATION OF RECEIVERSHIP AND BANKRUPTCY PROCEEDINGS

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 203.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S.Res. 203) submitted by Mr. ASHURST, Mr. MCADOO, Mr. VAN NUYS, Mr. HEBERT, and Mr. AUSTIN on the calendar day, March 8, 1934, and reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, with an amendment, in line 5, to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$10,000", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the special committee authorized and directed by Senate Resolution 78 on June 13, 1933, to investigate the administration of receivership and bankruptcy proceedings in the courts of the United States is hereby authorized to expend in furtherance of such purposes the sum of $10,000 in addition to the amount heretofore authorized and expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN CONTRACTORS AND EMPLOYEES

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 228, Calendar No. 1286.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S.Res. 228) submitted by Mr. DAVIS and Mr. WALSH on the calendar day April 30, 1934, which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with amendments, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "District of Columbia" and insert "United States"; on page 2, line 2, after the word "racket", to strike out the word "and"; in line 5, after the word "abuses", to insert:

(4) If contractors paying the prevailing rate of wages are discriminated against or are unable to obtain contracts for the construction or repair of such buildings or works because of underbidding by contractors paying their employees, by reason of the so-called "kick-back racket" or other similar practice, wages at less than the prevailing rate, and (5) the existence of any other abuses affecting employees or employers engaged in the construction or repair of such buildings or works; and the requirements of employment, a practice known as the "kick-back racket", (3) ing for, and in securing employment.

In line 17, after the word "recommendations", to insert the words "for necessary legislation in connection therewith"; and on page 3, line 5, to strike out "$25,000", and insert "$15,000", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to examine into the relationship existing between contractors and their employees engaged in the construction of any public building, public work, or building or work in the United States financed in whole or in part by loans or grants from the United States, or in the repair thereof, with a view to determining, (1) if such employees receive the prevailing rates of wages of building-trades workers, (2) if such employees are forced to give up any part of the compensation to which they are entitled under their contract of employment, a practice known as the "kick-back racket", (3) if such employees are discharged and refused further employment on such construction projects for protesting against such "kick-back racket" or other abuses, (4) if contractors paying the prevailing rate of wages are discriminated against or unable to obtain contracts for the construction or repair of such buildings or works because of underbidding by contractors paying their employees, by reason of the so-called "kick-back racket" or other similar practice, wages at less than the prevailing rate, and (5) the existence of any other abuses affecting employees or employers engaged in the construction or repair of such buildings or works; and the requirements of employees to organizations of employees or others in qualifying for, and in securing employment. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations for necessary legislation in connection therewith.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-third Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $15,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I inquire as to the status of the resolution.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, the resolution was reported yesterday by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, it being a unanimous report. There are several amendments, one reducing the amount of the appropriation, recommended by the Committee on Education and Labor. The amendment is satisfactory to the authors of the resolution and was approved unanimously by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The resolution broadens the scope of the investigation beyond the District of Columbia and makes it apply to the United States as a whole. The resolution was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Oregon will not object.

Mr. McNARY. I am not going to object, but I want to know what we are about to do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

PROCEDURE IN IMPEACHMENT TRIALS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] as I ask the Senate to consider Senate Resolution 242, now on the calendar, being Calendar No. 1132, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment. I ask that the resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let us have the resolution read first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 242) submitted by Mr. ASHURST on the calendar day, May 17, 1934, and reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with amendments, as follows:

Resolved, That in the trial of any impeachment the Presiding Officer of the Senate, upon the order of the Senate, shall appoint a committee of 12 Senators to receive evidence and take testimony at such times and places as the committee may determine, and for such purpose the committee so appointed and the chairman thereof, to be elected by the committee, shall (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) exercise all the powers and functions conferred upon the Senate and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, respectively, under the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials.

Unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials shall govern the procedure and practice of the committee so appointed. The committee so appointed shall report to the Senate in writing a certified copy of the transcript of the proceedings and testimony had and given before such committee, and such report shall be received by the Senate and the evidence so received and the testimony so taken shall be considered to all intents and purposes, subject to the right of the Senate to determine competency, relevancy, and materiality, as having been received and taken before the Senate, but nothing herein shall prevent the Senate from sending for any witness and hearing his testimony in open Senate, or by order of the Senate having the entire trial in open Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. Does not the Senator believe there ought to be a provision in the resolution forbidding the committee to make any recommendation to the Senate?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct. Frankness requires me to say that the resolution originally could have been construed to permit the committee to make recommendations, but the Senate Committee on the Judiciary struck out that language and inserted language which would not allow any recommendation to be made, but simply a report of the testimony, leaving it to the Senate and remitting to the Senate its power and right and sole authority to determine the questions of relevancy, materiality, and the weight of the evidence. The committee would make no recommendations.

Mr. COUZENS. I submit there is no such prohibition, as I understood the resolution when read.

Mr. ASHURST. I am sure no committee under the amended resolution would attempt to make a recommendation.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. HEBERT. I was not present at the meeting of the Judiciary Committee when the resolution was considered. I do not want to say now that I am opposed to it, but it is my understanding that it need not change the existing procedure. In other words, unless the Senate sees fit to do so, it need not appoint such committee as is provided in the resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HEBERT. There is one point to which I wish to invite the attention of the Senator, and that is in relation to the number of members of the committee which is proposed. Under the present wording of the resolution unless 12 Senators be present at all times it will not be competent for the committee to take any testimony. It has seemed to me that there might be some provision in the resolution for fixing a minimum number of Senators to constitute a quorum. It must be apparent to every Senator that it might be extremely difficult to have all 12 members of the committee present all the time while testimony was being taken. It occurred to me that the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee might well consider the possibility of making a change in that respect.

Mr. NORRIS rose.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island said he was not present at the meeting of the committee when the resolution was considered. If that be true, and it is true if the Senator says so, that it is probably the only meeting of the committee the Senator ever missed, because we have no more assiduous, diligent, and able Senator than the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HEBERT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield now to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have been consulting with the chairman of the committee about this resolution. My idea is that since the Judiciary Committee has amended the resolution so as to make of this committee a simple committee to take evidence, without power to do anything else that the committee named in the resolution is entirely too large. There is not any use of having 12 members on a committee who have no jurisdiction even to make a recommendation to the Senate. They can only take the evidence and certify it to the Senate.

I think the membership ought to be smaller than the number that has been suggested. The chairman has suggested, and other Members have suggested, that the number ought to be reduced at least to eight, and I am about to make a motion to that effect. Before doing so I should like to say in answer to the Senator's suggestion that if they cannot all be there, that in my judgment—I should like to be corrected if I am wrong—general parliamentary law would apply to this committee, whatever might be its number. There would have to be a quorum there all the time; and unless we should provide how many members should constitute a quorum, a quorum would be a majority of the committee.

So I take it that whatever the number may be, they can continue to function and take evidence so long as there is a quorum of the committee present. If the membership were 12, a quorum would be 7. If there were 8 members of the committee, they could do business as long as 5 members were present.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, so far as I possess the authority, I accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Nebraska, as follows:

A committee of 8 Senators, of whom 5 shall constitute a quorum.

Mr. HEBERT. I think that would be satisfactory.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be satisfactory. There certainly is no objection to fixing the number of a quorum at 5. It would be 5 anyway if there were 8 members of the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before that matter is disposed of I should like to ask a question as to construction. Is it assumed that this committee will hear witnesses as well as take documentary testimony?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. Then may I ask another question? Assuming that the party who is on trial calls for a rehearing—that is to say, calls for a hearing of all the witnesses before the Senate instead of before the committee—would he have the right to do that; and would it be necessary to have the witnesses heard again before the Senate?

Mr. ASHURST. Under order of the Senate the Senate could send for the same witness to give his testimony or send for additional witnesses or all witnesses. There is no intention whatever to deprive the Senate or the respondent of the right at any time the Senate chooses to hear all the testimony in open Senate or any witness in open Senate.

Instead of taking the testimony in the open Senate with all Senators presumably present, the resolution remits the duty and task of taking testimony or any part thereof to a committee if the Senate so chooses; and before that may be done the Senate must make and enter the appropriate order in each particular case.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that under the rules of impeachment and the law with reference to impeachment, if the respondent should call for a hearing of all witnesses before the Senate, it would have to follow as a matter of right. He would be entitled to it upon a mere request on his part to have it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Why does the Senator from Idaho assume that if the respondent should insist upon being confronted with the witnesses he would have that right?

Mr. BORAH. My view is that the Senate is the body which tries the respondent, not a subcommittee or a committee of the Senate; and therefore the respondent would be entitled to a full trial in every respect before the entire Senate if he should ask for it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should think the Senate would be the judge of whether it wished to hear the witnesses in person, or to take their testimony by deposition, or in some other way. The constitutional provision which gives to the accused in criminal cases the right to be confronted with the witnesses plainly, to my mind, does not apply in impeachment proceedings, because they are not criminal cases within the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. NORRIS. The respondent would still have that privilege. He would be confronted with the witnesses before the committee.

Mr. BORAH. He would not be compelled to go before the committee at all.

Mr. NORRIS. All right. Then he would not have availed himself of the privilege.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. He would not be deprived of any right to which he is entitled.

Mr. BORAH. I do not agree with that proposition, because he would be entitled to stand upon his right to be tried by the entire Senate, and to have the full trial before the entire Senate. He might consent to go before the committee, but if he did not do so he would not waive any of his rights to have a full trial before the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in my judgment, the taking of testimony by a committee constitutes a part of the trial by the Senate. Under the Constitution, the Senate, as one branch of the law-making body, is charged with the responsibility of enacting legislation. It proceeds uniformly through committees. If the Senate chooses to take the deposition of a witness rather than to compel the attendance of a witness, even under the old practice, that may be done.

Mr. BORAH. As I see the matter—I am not desirous of opposing the resolution; I am simply expressing my view—when the Senate becomes a body to try an impeachment, it is a court. It is no longer a Senate; and the Constitution provides that the respondent may be tried by this court, and this court only. Nothing less than the Senate is the court.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But, if the Senator will permit me, the Constitution does not provide that the respondent shall be entitled to be confronted with the witnesses. That is the point I make. Many courts with which both the Senator from Idaho and I are familiar try cases upon written evidence when the witnesses never appear in person before the court. The tribunal is just as much a court, however, as if the witnesses appeared in person.

Mr. BORAH. My research, limited though it is, finds no precedent whatever for action of this kind. Under the provisions with reference to the trial of parties by the Senate, when it becomes a court, in my opinion, it must maintain its integrity as a court in its fullness and its completeness. When the Senate sets up a court it must be regarded as a single entity. It might be that he would be entirely satisfied with the hearings before the committee; but, if he were not, I think he would have a right to call for a full hearing before the Senate.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, my interest in this matter, as will appear from my statement, is not wholly casual. The public press reports that there are three judges sitting in the State of Illinois who are, it is assumed, under charges which are to be the basis of investigation by the House and by the Senate.

In view of the fact that I must indulge in their behalf the presumption of innocence which attends all men charged with offense until there is proof of their guilt, I desire to have it now understood, if the able Chairman of the Judiciary Committee can inform me, if proceedings looking to impeachment should be addressed to the judges concerning whom we read in the press that there is such a possibility, would those judges be allowed to be present? And then, keeping in view the statement of the Senator from Idaho, would the persons so charged be equally permitted the right to be ultimately heard before the whole Senate when the proceedings for review came before the body as a Court of Impeachment?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I answer the able Senator from Illinois as follows:

The respondent certainly would be entitled to be heard before the committee in person, by attorney, and to summon any witnesses he saw fit to have subpenaed, to cross-examine all the witness for the prosecution, to have the testimony taken in shorthand and transcribed into printing or typewriting; and the respondent further would have the right to ask the Senate to hear one witness, or all of them, in open Senate, in accordance with our ancient practice; and the Senate then would determine whether it wished to hear these witnesses, or all of them, in open session.

Mr. LEWIS. I appreciate the reply of the Senator. May I ask the able Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], now a member of the Judiciary Committee and previously its chairman, whether the view expressed by my able friend from Arizona meets with the approval of the former chairman of the committee?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the constitutional provisions which I have on my desk before me. If the Senator will yield for that purpose, I will do so now.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I shall be pleased to have the Senator do so in reply to my inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. The Constitution says:

> The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present.

It says further—and I think this has an important bearing on this question:

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

I think we ought to distinguish an impeachment trial from an ordinary trial before a court.

It is a special proceeding set up by the Constitution, but we are not given power to render any judgment except that which is specified in the Constitution; that is to say, if we find the respondent guilty, to remove him from office, and, if we desire, declare that he shall never afterward be allowed to hold an office under the United States. We cannot convict him of a crime, or anything of that kind. It seems to me, therefore, that we can take the evidence in any way we see fit.

I think that when we provide that a committee shall take the evidence, if the respondent in the case desires to be present before the committee, to cross-examine witnesses, and so forth, that is where he ought to appear. It is said that perhaps he would not appear there, but he would have the privilege of appearing and being represented by an attorney, cross-examining the witnesses, or offering witnesses of his own.

In other words, we delegate to a committee the tedious task of taking the evidence, and that committee, under this resolution, would have no authority whatever even to make a recommendation. They would simply certify the evidence back to the Senate. I think the Senate could appoint an individual to take the evidence if it desired to do so. The trial of the case would take place in the Senate, the evidence would be offered here, and the Senate would pass on it.

If the Senate should decide to take this action, and if, notwithstanding the taking of the evidence by the committee, the accused would have the right to have it heard again in the Senate, we should not adopt the resolution, in my judgment. We would simply have two trials instead of one. After the trial before the committee, it would be tried again, if the accused so desired, in the Senate. I do not see any reason why the Senate cannot delegate to a committee the right to take the evidence and certify it to the Senate. It is in the Senate that the trial would take place.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Of course, all Senators know that another body of Congress, when they consider an impeachment, refer the matter of taking testimony to a committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. The testimony is not taken in the House of Representatives.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is fair to say, however, that that is not a trial.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is the process by which the House reaches its conclusion as to whether or not to impeach.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the object of the resolution is to avoid what always takes place in an impeachment trial before the Senate. There are times when there is not a quorum of the Senate present, when a dozen may not be here, when there are less than the number provided as the membership of the proposed committee to take the evidence. There is no use expecting all the Senate, or a quorum of the Senate, to be present every minute while evidence is being taken. Senators have to read the evidence in the RECORD in order to know what it is.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me to suggest, I take it that if the accused desired to be heard, either in person or by counsel, before the full Senate, he would have that right.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senate would have the right to give him that privilege under the resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think he would have that right.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think he would have it as a matter of right if the Senate did not want to give him the privilege; but the resolution expressly provides, in order to avoid the possibility of doing anybody a wrong, that if the Senate wishes, it can give the respondent the privilege, or, upon its own motion, take any additional evidence.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, may we have read the amendment now proposed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 1, line 3, after the word "of", to strike out the word "twelve" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "eight"; and after the word "Senators", to insert the words "of whom five shall constitute a quorum."

Mr. ASHURST. So far as I have any authority to do so, I accept the amendment, and ask for a vote on the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is not yet before the Senate. The Senator from Arizona asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution. The Senator from Oregon asked to have the resolution read. Since that time unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution has not been given.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I ask the Senator whether, if unanimous consent is had, he expects to proceed at once with the resolution? I should like to occupy 5 minutes on it if we are to proceed with it, but I do not want to take up any time if we are not to proceed with it.

Mr. ASHURST. I feel that it would be a trespass on the time of the Senate and on the courtesy of other Senators if I should ask for further debate on the subject. If the able Senator from California wishes to discuss it, of course, he has that right.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will not discuss it at length, I assure the Senator, but I would not take any time on it now unless we were going ahead with the matter.

Mr. ASHURST. I should like to secure action.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to the resolution being taken up.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I shall reserve the right to object.

Mr. McNARY. There could not be consideration of the resolution at this time unless unanimous consent were given.

Mr. ASHURST. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. I am not sure that it is appropriate to take it up today. Evidently it is going to lead to considerable debate.

Mr. ASHURST. If the resolution is to lead to debate, I respectfully withdraw the request.

REGULATION OF SECURITIES EXCHANGES—CONFERENCE REPORT (S.DOC. NO. 185)

Mr. FLETCHER. I submit a conference report on the securities exchanges bill and ask that it may lie on the table and be printed. I shall try to call the report up on tomorrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received, lie on the table, and be printed.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9323) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"TITLE I—REGULATION OF SECURITIES EXCHANGES

"SHORT TITLE

"SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the 'Securities Exchange Act of 1934.'

"NECESSITY FOR REGULATION AS PROVIDED IN THIS TITLE

"SEC. 2. For the reasons hereinafter enumerated, transactions in securities as commonly conducted upon securities exchanges and over-the-counter markets are affected with a national public interest which makes it necessary to provide for regulation and control of such transactions and of practices and matters related thereto, including transactions by officers, directors, and principal security holders, to require appropriate reports, and to impose requirements necessary to make such regulation and control reasonably complete and effective, in order to protect interstate commerce, the national credit, the Federal taxing power, to protect and make more effective the national banking system and Federal Reserve System, and to insure the maintenance of fair and honest markets in such transactions:

"(1) Such transactions (a) are carried on in large volume by the public generally and in large part originate outside the States in which the exchanges and over-the-counter markets are located and/or are effected by means of the mails and instrumentalities of interstate commerce; (b) constitute an important part of the current of interstate commerce; (c) involve in large part the securities of issuers engaged in interstate commerce; (d) involve the use of credit, directly affect the financing of trade, industry, and transportation in interstate commerce, and directly affect and influence the volume of interstate commerce; and affect the national credit.

"(2) The prices established and offered in such transactions are generally disseminated and quoted throughout the United States and foreign countries and constitute a basis for determining and establishing the prices at which securities are bought and sold, the amount of certain taxes owing to the United States and to the several States by owners, buyers, and sellers of securities, and the value of collateral for bank loans.

"(3) Frequently the prices of securities on such exchanges and markets are susceptible to manipulation and control, and the dissemination of such prices gives rise to excessive speculation, resulting in sudden and unreasonable fluctuations in the prices of securities which (a) cause alternately unreasonable expansion and unreasonable contraction of the volume of credit available for trade, transportation, and industry in interstate commerce, (b) hinder the proper appraisal of the value of securities and thus prevent a fair calculation of taxes owing to the United States and to the several States by owners, buyers, and sellers of securities, and (c) prevent the fair valuation of collateral for bank loans and/or obstruct the effective operation of the national banking system and Federal Reserve System.

"(4) National emergencies, which produce widespread unemployment and the dislocation of trade, transportation, and industry, and which burden interstate commerce and adversely affect the general welfare, are precipitated, intensified, and prolonged by manipulation and sudden and unreasonable fluctuations of security prices and by excessive speculation on such exchanges and markets, and to meet such emergencies the Federal Government is put to such great expense as to burden the national credit.

"SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

"SEC. 4. (a) There is hereby established a Securities and Exchange Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission") to be composed of five commissioners to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than three of such commissioners shall be members of the same political party, and in making appointments members of different political parties shall be appointed alternately as nearly as may be practicable. No commisisoner shall engage in any other business, vocation, or employment than that of serving as commissioner, nor shall any commissioner participate, directly or indirectly, in any stock-market operations or transactions of a character subject to regulation by the Commission pursuant to this title. Each commissioner shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 a year and shall hold office for a term of 5 years, except that (1) any commissioner appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, shall be appointed for the remainder of such term, and (2) the terms of office of the commissioners first taking office after the date of enactment of this title shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of nomination, 1 at the end of 1 year, 1 at the end of 2 years, 1 at the end of 3 years, 1 at the end of 4 years, and 1 at the end of 5 years, after the date of enactment of this title.

"TRANSACTIONS ON UNREGISTERED EXCHANGES

"SEC. 5. It shall be unlawful for any broker, dealer, or exchange, directly or indirectly, to make use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce for the purpose of using any facility of an exchange within or subject to the jurisdiction of the United States to effect any transaction in a security, or to report any such transaction, unless such exchange (1) is registered as a national securities exchange under section 6 of this title, or (2) is exempted from such registration upon application by the exchange because, in the opinion of the Commission, by reason of the limited volume of transactions effected on such exchange, it is not practicable and not necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors to require such registration.

"REGISTRATION OF NATIONAL SECURITIES EXCHANGES

"SEC. 6. (a) Any exchange may be registered with the Commission as a national securities exchange under the terms and conditions hereinafter provided in this section, by filing a registration statement in such form as the Commission may prescribe, containing the agreements, setting forth the information, and accompanied by the documents, below specified:

"(1) An agreement (which shall not be construed as a waiver of any constitutional right or any right to contest the validity of any rule or regulation) to comply, and to enforce so far as is within its powers compliance by its members, with the provisions of this title, and any amendment thereto and any rule or regulation made or to be made thereunder;

"(2) Such data as to its organization, rules of procedure, and membership, and such other information as the Commission may by rules and regulations require as being necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors;

"(3) Copies of its constitution, articles of incorporation with all amendments thereto, and of its existing bylaws or rules or instruments corresponding thereto, whatever the name, which are hereinafter collectively referred to as the 'rules of the exchange'; and

"(4) An agreement to furnish to the Commission copies of any amendments to the rules of the exchange forthwith upon their adoption.

"(b) No registration shall be granted or remain in force unless the rules of the exchange include provision for the expulsion, suspension, or disciplining of a member for conduct or proceeding inconsistent with just and equitable principles of trade, and declare that the willful violation of any provisions of this title or any rule or regulation thereunder shall be considered conduct or proceeding inconsistent with just and equitable principles of trade.

"(c) Nothing in this title shall be construed to prevent any exchange from adopting and enforcing any rule not inconsistent with this title and the rules and regulations thereunder and the applicable laws of the State in which it is located.

"(d) If it appears to the Commission that the exchange applying for registration is so organized as to be able to comply with the provisions of this title and the rules and regulations thereunder and that the rules of the exchange are just and adequate to insure fair dealing and to protect investors, the Commission shall cause such exchange to be registered as a national securities exchange.

"(e) Within 30 days after the filing of the application, the Commission shall enter an order either granting or, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, denying registration as a national securities exchange, unless the exchange applying for registration shall withdraw its application or consent to the Commission's deferring action on its application for a stated longer period after the date of filing. The filing with the Commission of an application for registration by an exchange shall be deemed to have taken place upon the receipt thereof. Amendments to an application may be made upon such terms as the Commission may prescribe.

"(f) An exchange may, upon appropriate application in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Commission, and upon such terms as the Commission may deem necessary for the protection of investors, withdraw its registration.

"MARGIN REQUIREMENTS

"SEC. 7. (a) For the purpose of preventing the excessive use of credit for the purchase or carrying of securities, the Federal Reserve Board shall, prior to the effective date of this section and from time to time thereafter, prescribe rules and regulations with respect to the amount of credit that may be initially extended and subsequently maintained on any security (other than an exempted security) registered on a national securities exchange. For the initial extension of credit, such rules and regulations shall be based upon the following standard: An amount not greater than whichever is the higher of—

"(1) 55 percent of the current market price of the security, or

"(2) 100 percent of the lowest market price of the security during the preceding 36 calendar months, but not more than 75 percent of the current market price.

Such rules and regulations may make appropriate provision with respect to the carrying of undermargined accounts for limited periods and under specified conditions; the withdrawal of funds or securities; the substitution or additional purchases of securities; the transfer of accounts from one lender to another; special or different margin requirements for delayed deliveries, short sales, arbitrage transactions, and securities to which paragraph (2) of this subsection does not apply; the bases and the methods to be used in calculating loans, and margins and market prices; and similar administrative adjustments and details. For the purposes of paragraph (2) of this subsection, until July 1, 1936, the lowest price at which a security has sold on or after July 1, 1933, shall be considered as the lowest price at which such security has sold during the preceding 36 calendar months.

"(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, the Federal Reserve Board, may, from time to time, with respect to all or specified securities or transactions, or classes of securities, or classes of transactions, by such rules and regulations (1) prescribe such lower margin requirement for the initial extension or maintenance of credit as it deems necessary or appropriate for the accommodation of commerce and industry, having due regard to the general credit situation of the country, and (2) prescribe such higher margin requirements for the initial extension or maintenance of credit as it may deem necessary or appropriate to prevent the excessive use of credit to finance transactions in securities.

"(c) It shall be unlawful for any member of a national securities exchange or any broker or dealer who transacts a business in securities through the medium of any such member, directly or indirectly to extend or maintain credit or arrange for the extension or maintenance of credit to or for any customer—

"(1) On any security (other than an exempted security) registered on a national securities exchange, in contravention of the rules and regulations which the Federal Reserve Board shall prescribe under subsections (a) and (b) of this section.

"(2) Without collateral or on any collateral other than exempted securities and/or securities registered upon a national securities exchange except in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe (A) to permit under specified conditions and for a limited period any such member, broker, or dealer to maintain a credit initially extended in conformity with the rules and regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, and (B) to permit the extension or maintenance of credit in cases where the extension or maintenance of credit is not for the purpose of purchasing or carrying securities or of evading or circumventing the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection.

"(d) It shall be unlawful for any person not subject to subsection (c) to extend or maintain credit or to arrange for the extension or maintenance of credit for the purpose of purchasing or carrying any security registered on a national securities exchange, in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board shall prescribe to prevent the excessive use of credit for the purchasing or carrying of or trading in securities in circumvention of the other provisions of this section. Such rules and regulations may impose upon all loans made for the purpose of purchasing or carrying securities registered on national securities exchanges limitations similar to those imposed upon members, brokers, or dealers by subsection (c) of this section and the rules and regulations thereunder. This subsection and the rules and regulations thereunder shall not apply (A) to a loan made by a person not in the ordinary course of his business, (B) to a loan on an exempted security, (C) to a loan to a dealer to aid in the financing of the distribution of securities to customers not through the medium of a national securities exchange, (D) to a loan by a bank on a security other than an equity security, or (E) to such other loans as the Federal Reserve Board shall, by such rules and regulations as it may deem necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, exempt, either unconditionally or upon specified terms and conditions or for stated periods, from the operation of this subsection and the rules and regulations thereunder.

"(e) The provisions of this section or the rules and regulations thereunder shall not apply on or before July 1, 1937, to any loan or extension of credit made prior to the enactment of this title or to the maintenance, renewal, or extension of any such loan or credit, except to the extent that the Federal Reserve Board may by rules and regulations prescribe as necessary to prevent the circumvention of the provisions of this section or the rules and regulations thereunder by means of withdrawals of funds or securities, substitutions of securities, or additional purchases or by any other device.

"RESTRICTIONS ON BORROWING BY MEMBERS, BROKERS, AND DEALERS

"SEC. 8. It shall be unlawful for any member of a national securities exchange, or any broker or dealer who transacts a business in securities through the medium of any such member, directly or indirectly—

"(a) To borrow in the ordinary course of business as a broker or dealer on any security (other than an exempted security) registered on a national securities exchange except (1) from or through a member bank of the Federal Reserve System, (2) from any nonmember bank which shall have filed with the Federal Reserve Board an agreement, which is still in force and which is in the form prescribed by the Board, undertaking to comply with all provisions of this act, the Federal Reserve Act, as amended, and the Banking Act of 1933, which are applicable to member banks and which relate to the use of credit to finance transactions in securities, and with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed pursuant to such provisions of law or for the purpose of preventing evasions thereof, or (3) in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe to permit loans between such members and/or brokers and/or dealers, or to permit loans to meet emergency needs. Any such agreement filed with the Federal Reserve Board shall be subject to termination at any time by order of the Board, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, because of any failure by such bank to comply with the provisions thereof or with such provisions of law or rules or regulations; and, for any willful violation of such agreement, such bank shall be subject to the penalties provided for violations of rules and regulations prescribed under this title. The provisions of sections 21 and 25 of this title shall apply in the case of any such proceeding or order of the Federal Reserve Board in the same manner as such provisions apply in the case of proceedings and orders of the Commission.

"(b) To permit in the ordinary course of business as a broker his aggregate indebtedness to all other persons, including customers' credit balances (but excluding indebtedness secured by exempted securities), to exceed such percentage of the net capital (exclusive of fixed assets and value of exchange membership) employed in the business, but not exceeding in any case 2,000 percent, as the Commission may by rules and regulations prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

"(c) In contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission shall prescribe for the protection of investors to hypothecate or arrange for the hypothecation of any securities carried for the account of any customer under circumstances (1) that will permit the commingling of his securities without his written consent with the securities of any other customer, (2) that will permit such securities to be commingled with the securities of any person other than a bona fide customer, or (3) that will permit such securities to be hypothecated, or subjected to any lien or claim of the pledgee, for a sum in excess of the aggregate indebtedness of such customers in respect of such securities.

"(d) To lend or arrange for the lending of any securities carried for the account of any customer without the written consent of such customer.

"PROHIBITION AGAINST MANIPULATION OF SECURITY PRICES

"SEC. 9. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, by the use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or of any facility of any national securities exchange, or for any member of a national securities exchange—

"(1) For the purpose of creating a false or misleading appearance of active trading in any security registered on a national securities exchange, or a false or misleading appearance with respect to the market for any such security, (A) to effect any transaction in such security which involves no change in the beneficial ownership thereof, or (B) to enter an order or orders for the purchase of such security with the knowledge that an order or orders of substantially the same size, at substantially the same time, and at substantially the same price, for the sale of any such security, has been or will be entered by or for the same or different parties, or (C) to enter any order or orders for the sale of any such security with the knowledge that an order or orders of substantially the same size, at substantially the same time, and at substantially the same price, for the purchase of such security, has been or will be entered by or for the same or different parties.

"(2) To effect, alone or with one or more other persons, a series of transactions in any security registered on a national securities exchange creating actual or apparent active trading in such security, or raising or depressing the price of such security, for the purpose of inducing the purchase or sale of such security by others.

"(3) If a dealer or broker, or other person selling or offering for sale or purchasing or offering to purchase the security, to induce the purchase or sale of any security registered on a national securities exchange by the circulation or dissemination in the ordinary course of business of information to the effect that the price of any such security will or is likely to rise or fall because of market operations of any one or more persons conducted for the purpose of raising or depressing the price of such security.

"(4) If a dealer or broker, or other person selling or offering for sale or purchasing or offering to purchase the security, to make, regarding any security registered on a national securities exchange, for the purpose of inducing the purchase or sale of such security, any statement which was at the time and in the light of the circumstances under which it was made, false or misleading with respect to any material fact, and which he knew or had reasonable ground to believe was so false or misleading.

"(5) For a consideration, received directly or indirectly from a dealer or broker, or other person selling or offering for sale or purchasing or offering to purchase the security, to induce the purchase or sale of any security registered on a national securities exchange by the circulation or dissemination of information to the effect that the price of any such security will or is likely to rise or fall because of the market operations of any one or more persons conducted for the purpose of raising or depressing the price of such security.

"(6) To effect either alone or with one or more other persons any series of transactions for the purchase and/or sale of any security registered on a national securities exchange for the purpose of pegging, fixing, or stabilizing the price of such security in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

"(b) It shall be unlawful for any person to effect, by use of any facility of a national securities exchange, in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors—

"(1) Any transaction in connection with any security whereby any party to such transaction acquires any put, call, straddle, or other option or privilege of buying the security from or selling the security to another without being bound to do so; or

"(2) Any transaction in connection with any security with relation to which he has, directly or indirectly, any interest in any such put, call, straddle, option, or privilege; or

"(3) Any transaction in any security for the account of any person who he has reason to believe has, and who actually has, directly or indirectly, any interest in any such put, call, straddle, option, or privilege with relation to such security.

"(c) It shall be unlawful for any member of a national securities exchange directly or indirectly to endorse or guarantee the performance of any put, call, straddle, option, or privilege in relation to any security registered on a national securities exchange, in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

"(d) The terms 'put', 'call', 'straddle', 'option', or 'privilege' as used in this section shall not include any registered warrant, right, or convertible security.

"(e) Any person who willfully participates in any act or transaction in violation of subsection (a), (b), or (c) of this section, shall be liable to any person who shall purchase or sell any security at a price which was affected by such act or transaction, and the person so injured may sue in law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction to recover the damages sustained as a result of any such act or transaction. In any such suit the court may, in its discretion, require an undertaking for the payment of the costs of such suit, and assess reasonable costs, including reasonable attorneys' fees, against either party litigant. Every person who becomes liable to make any payment under this subsection may recover contribution as in cases of contract from any person who, if joined in the original suit, would have been liable to make the same payment. No action shall be maintained to enforce any liability created under this section, unless brought within 1 year after the discovery of the facts constituting the violation and within 3 years after such violation.

"(f) The provisions of this section shall not apply to an exempted security.

"REGULATION OF THE USE OF MANIPULATIVE AND DECEPTIVE DEVICES

"SEC. 10. It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, by the use of any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce or of the mails, or of any facility of any national securities exchange—

"(a) To effect a short sale, or to use or employ any stop-loss order in connection with the purchase or sale, of any security registered on a national securities exchange, in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

"(b) To use or employ, in connection with the purchase or sale of any security registered on a national securities exchange or any security not so registered, any manipulative or deceptive device or contrivance in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

"SEGREGATION AND LIMITATION OF FUNCTIONS OF MEMBERS, BROKERS, AND DEALERS

"SEC. 11. (a) The Commission shall prescribe such rules and regulations as it deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, (1) to regulate or prevent floor trading by members of national securities exchanges, directly or indirectly for their own account or for discretionary accounts, and (2) to prevent such excessive trading on the exchange but off the floor by members, directly or indirectly for their own account, as the Commission may deem detrimental to the maintenance of a fair and orderly market. It shall be unlawful for a member to effect any transaction in a security in contravention of such rules and regulations, but such rules and regulations may make such exemptions for arbitrage transactions, for transactions in exempted securities, and, within the limitations of subsection (b) of this section, for transactions by odd-lot dealers and specialists, as the Commission may deem necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

"(b) When not in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, the rules of a national securities exchange may permit (1) a member to be registered as an odd-lot dealer and as such to buy and sell for his own account so far as may be reasonably necessary to carry on such odd-lot transactions, and/or (2) a member to be registered as a specialist. If under the rules and regulations of the Commission a specialist is permitted to act as a dealer, or is limited to acting as a dealer, such rules and regulations shall restrict his dealings so far as practicable to those reasonably necessary to permit him to maintain a fair and orderly market, and/or to those necessary to permit him to act as an odd-lot dealer if the rules of the exchange permit him to act as an odd-lot dealer. It shall be unlawful for a specialist or an official of the exchange to disclose information in regard to orders placed with such specialist which is not available to all members of the exchange, to any person other than an official of the exchange, a representative of the Commission, or a specialist who may be acting for such specialist; but the Commission shall have power to require disclosure to all members of the exchange of all orders placed with specialists, under such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors. It shall also be unlawful for a specialist acting as a broker to effect on the exchange any transaction except upon a market or limited price order.

"(c) If because of the limited volume of transactions effected on an exchange, it is in the opinion of the Commission impracticable and not necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors to apply any of the foregoing provisions of this section or the rules and regulations thereunder, the Commission shall have power, upon application of the exchange and on a showing that the rules of such exchange are otherwise adequate for the protection of investors, to exempt such exchange and its members from any such provision or rules and regulations.

"(d) It shall be unlawful for a member of a national securities exchange who is both a dealer and a broker, or for any person who both as a broker and a dealer transacts a business in securities through the medium of a member or otherwise, to effect through the use of any facility of a national securities exchange or of the mails or of any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, or otherwise in the case of a member, (1) any transaction in connection with which, directly or indirectly, he extends or maintains or arranges for the extension or maintenance of credit to or for a customer on any security (other than an exempted security) which was a part of a new issue in the distribution of which he participated as a member of a selling syndicate or group within 6 months prior to such transaction: Provided, That credit shall not be deemed extended by reason of a bona fide delayed delivery of any such security against full payment of the entire purchase price thereof upon such delivery within 35 days after such purchase, or (2) any transaction with respect to any security (other than an exempted security) unless, if the transaction is with a customer, he discloses to such customer in writing at or before the completion of the transaction whether he is acting as a dealer for his own account, as a broker for such customer, or as a broker for some other person.

"(e) The Commission is directed to make a study of the feasibility and advisability of the complete segregation of the functions of dealer and broker, and to report the results of its study and its recommendations to the Congress on or before January 3, 1936.

"REGISTRATION REQUIREMENTS FOR SECURITIES

"SEC. 12. (a) It shall be unlawful for any member, broker, or dealer to effect any transaction in any security (other than an exempted security) on a national securities exchange unless a registration is effective as to such security for such exchange in accordance with the provisions of this title and the rules and regulations thereunder.

"(b) A security may be registered on a national securities exchange by the issuer filing an application with the exchange (and filing with the Commission, such duplicate originals thereof as the Commission may require), which application shall contain—

"(1) Such information, in such detail, as to the issuer and any person directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by, or under direct or indirect common control with, the issuer, and any guarantor of the security as to principal or interest or both, as the Commission may by rules and regulations require, as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors, in respect of the following:

"(A) the organization, financial structure and nature of the business;

"(B) the terms, position, rights, and privileges of the different classes of securities outstanding;

"(C) the terms on which their securities are to be, and during the preceding 3 years have been, offered to the public or otherwise;

"(E) remuneration to others than directors and officers exceeding $20,000 per annum;

"(F) bonus and profit-sharing arrangements;

"(G) management and service contracts;

"(H) options existing or to be created in respect of their securities;

"(I) balance sheets for not more than the 3 preceding fiscal years, certified if required by the rules and regulations of the Commission by independent public accountants;

"(J) profit and loss statements for not more than the 3 preceding fiscal years, certified if required by the rules and regulations of the Commission by independent public accountants; and

"(K) any further financial statements which the Commission may deem necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors.

"(2) Such copies of articles of incorporation, bylaws, trust indentures, or corresponding documents by whatever name known, underwriting arrangements, and other similar documents of, and voting trust agreements with respect to, the issuer and any person directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by, or under direct or indirect common control with, the issuer as the Commission may require as necessary or appropriate for the proper protection of investors and to insure fair dealing in the security.

"(c) If in the judgment of the Commission any information required under subsection (b) is inapplicable to any specified class or classes of issuers, the Commission shall require in lieu thereof the submission of such other information of comparable character as it may deem applicable to such class of issuers.

"(d) If the exchange authorities certify to the Commission that the security has been approved by the exchange for listing and registration, the registration shall become effective 30 days after the receipt of such certification by the Commission or within such shorter period of time as the Commission may determine. A security registered with a national securities exchange may be withdrawn or stricken from listing and registration in accordance with the rules of the exchange and, upon such terms as the Commission may deem necessary to impose for the protection of investors, upon application by the issuer or the exchange to the Commission; whereupon the issuer shall be relieved from further compliance with the provisions of this section and section 13 of this title and any rules or regulations under such sections as to the securities so withdrawn or stricken.

"An unissued security may be registered only in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors. Such rules and regulations shall limit the registration of an unissued security to cases where such security is a right or the subject of a right to subscribe or otherwise acquire such security granted to holders of a previously registered security and where the primary purpose of such registration is to distribute such unissued security to such holders.

"(e) Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this section, the Commission may by such rules and regulations as it deems necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors permit securities listed on any exchange at the time the registration of such exchange as a national securities exchange becomes effective, to be registered for a period ending not later than July 1, 1935, without complying with the provisions of this section.

"(f) The Commission is directed to make a study of trading in unlisted securities upon exchanges and to report the results of its study and its recommendations to Congress on or before January 3, 1936. Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this section, the Commission may, by such rules and regulations as it deems necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors, prescribe terms and conditions under which, upon the application of any national securities exchange, such exchange (1) may continue until June 1, 1936, unlisted trading privileges to which a security had been admitted on such exchange prior to March 1, 1934, and for such purpose exempt such security and the issuer thereof from the provisions of this section and sections 13 and 16, or (2) may extend until July 1, 1935, unlisted trading privilege to any security registered on any other national securities exchange which security was listed on such other exchange on March 1, 1934.

"A security for which unlisted trading privileges are so continued shall be considered a 'security registered on a national securities exchange' within the meaning of this title. The rules and regulations of the Commission relating to such unlisted trading privileges for securities shall require that quotations of transactions upon any national securities exchange shall clearly indicate the difference between fully listed securities and securities admitted to unlisted trading privileges only.

"PERIODICAL AND OTHER REPORTS

"SEC. 13. (a) Every issuer of a security registered on a national securities exchange shall file the information, documents, and reports below specified with the exchange (and shall file with the Commission such duplicate originals thereof as the Commission may require), in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate for the proper protection of investors and to insure fair dealing in the security—

"(1) Such information and documents as the Commission may require to keep reasonably current the information and documents filed pursuant to section 12.

"(2) Such annual reports, certified if required by the rules and regulations of the Commission by independent public accountants, and such quarterly reports, as the Commission may prescribe.

"(b) The Commission may prescribe, in regard to reports made pursuant to this title, the form or forms in which the required information shall be set forth, the items or details to be shown in the balance sheet and the earning statement, and the methods to be followed in the preparation of reports, in the appraisal or valuation of assets and liabilities, in the determination of depreciation and depletion, in the differentiation of recurring and nonrecurring income, in the differentiation of investment and operating income, and in the preparation, where the Commission deems it necessary or desirable, of separate and/or consolidated balance sheets or income accounts of any person directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by the issuer, or any person under direct or indirect common control with the issuer; but in the case of the reports of any person whose methods of accounting are prescribed under the provisions of any law of the United States, or any rule or regulation thereunder, the rules and regulations of the Commission with respect to reports shall not be inconsistent with the requirements imposed by such law or rule or regulation in respect of the same subject matter, and, in the case of carriers subject to the provisions of section 20 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, or carriers required pursuant to any other act of Congress to make reports of the same general character as those required under such section 20, shall permit such carriers to file with the Commission and the exchange duplicate copies of the reports and other documents filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, or with the governmental authority administering such other act of Congress, in lieu of the reports, information, and documents required under this section and section 12 in respect of the same subject matter.

"(c) If in the judgment of the Commission any report required under subsection (a) is inapplicable to any specified class or classes of issuers, the Commission shall require in lieu thereof the submission of such reports of comparable character as it may deem applicable to such class or classes of issuers.

"PROXIES

"SEC. 14. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person, by the use of the mails or by any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce or of any facility of any national securities exchange or otherwise to solicit or to permit the use of his name to solicit any proxy or consent or authorization in respect of any security (other than an exempted security) registered on any national securities exchange in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

"(b) It shall be unlawful for any member of a national securities exchange or any broker or dealer who transacts a business in securities through the medium of any such member to give a proxy, consent, or authorization in respect of any security registered on a national securities exchange and carried for the account of a customer in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

"OVER-THE-COUNTER MARKETS

"SEC. 15. It shall be unlawful, in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest and to insure to investors protection comparable to that provided by and under authority of this title in the case of national securities exchanges, (1) for any broker or dealer, singly or with any other person or persons, to make use of the mails or any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce for the purpose of making or creating, or enabling another to make or create, a market, otherwise than on a national securities exchange, for both the purchase and sale of any security (other than an exempted security or commercial paper, bankers' acceptances, or commercial bills, or unregistered securities the market in which is predominantly intrastate and which have not previously been registered or listed), or (2) for any broker or dealer to use any facility of any such market. Such rules and regulations may provide for the regulation of all transactions by brokers and dealers on any such market, for the registration with the Commission of dealers and/or brokers making or creating such a market, and for the registration of the securities for which they make or create a market and may make special provision with respect to securities or specified classes thereof listed, or entitled to unlisted trading privileges, upon any exchange on the date of the enactment of this title, which securities are not registered under the provisions of section 12 of this title.

"DIRECTORS, OFFICERS, AND PRINCIPAL STOCKHOLDERS

"SEC. 16. (a) Every person who is directly or indirectly the beneficial owner of more than 10 percent of any class of any equity security (other than an exempted security) which is registered on a national securities exchange, or who is a director or an officer of the issuer of such security, shall file, at the time of the registration of such security or within 10 days after he becomes such beneficial owner, director, or officer, a statement with the exchange (and a duplicate original thereof with the Commission) of the amount of all equity securities of such issuer of which he is the beneficial owner, and within 10 days after the close of each calendar month thereafter, if there has been any change in such ownership during such month, shall file with the exchange a statement (and a duplicate original thereof with the Commission) indicating his ownership at the close of the calendar month and such changes in his ownership as have occurred during such calendar month.

"(b) For the purpose of preventing the unfair use of information which may have been obtained by such beneficial owner, director, or officer by reason of his relationship to the issuer, any profit realized by him from any purchase and sale, or any sale and purchase, of any equity security of such issuer (other than an exempted security) within any period of less than 6 months, unless such security was acquired in good faith in connection with a debt previously contracted, shall inure to and be recoverable by the issuer, irrespective of any intention on the part of such beneficial owner, director, or officer in entering into such transaction of holding the security purchased or of not repurchasing the security sold for a period exceeding 6 months. Suit to recover such profit may be instituted at law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction by the issuer, or by the owner of any security of the issuer in the name and in behalf of the issuer if the issuer shall fail or refuse to bring such suit within 60 days after request or shall fail diligently to prosecute the same thereafter; but no such suit shall be brought more than 2 years after the date such profit was realized. This subsection shall not be construed to cover any transaction where such beneficial owner was not such both at the time of the purchase and sale, or the sale and purchase, of the security involved, or any transaction or transactions which the Commission by rules and regulations may exempt as not comprehended within the purpose of this subsection.

"(c) It shall be unlawful for any such beneficial owner, director, or officer, directly or indirectly, to sell any equity security of such issuer (other than an exempted security), if the person selling the security or his principal (1) does not own the security sold, or (2) if owning the security, does not deliver it against such sale within 20 days thereafter, or does not within 5 days after such sale deposit it in the mails or other usual channels of transportation; but no person shall be deemed to have violated this subsection if he proves that notwithstanding the exercise of good faith he was unable to make such delivery or deposit within such time, or that to do so would cause undue inconvenience or expense.

"(d) The provisions of this section shall not apply to foreign or domestic arbitrage transactions unless made in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may adopt in order to carry out the purposes of this section.

"ACCOUNTS AND RECORDS, REPORTS, EXAMINATIONS OF EXCHANGES, MEMBERS, AND OTHERS

"SEC. 17. (a) Every national securities exchange, every member thereof, every broker or dealer who transacts a business in securities through the medium of any such member, and every broker or dealer making or creating a market for both the purchase and sale of securities through the use of the mails or of any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce, shall make, keep, and preserve for such periods, such accounts, correspondence, memoranda, papers, books, and other records, and make such reports, as the Commission by its rules and regulations may prescribe as necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors. Such accounts, correspondence, memoranda, papers, books, and other records shall be subject at any time or from time to time to such reasonable periodic, special, or other examinations by examiners or other representatives of the Commission as the Commission may deem necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

"(b) Any broker, dealer, or other person extending credit who is subject to the rules and regulations prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board pursuant to this title shall make such reports to the Board as it may require as necessary or appropriate to enable it to perform the functions conferred upon it by this title. If any such broker, dealer, or other person shall fail to make any such report or fail to furnish full information therein, or, if in the judgment of the Board it is otherwise necessary, such broker, dealer, or other person shall permit such inspections to be made by the Board with respect to the business operations of such broker, dealer, or other person as the Board may deem necessary to enable it to obtain the required information.

"LIABILITY FOR MISLEADING STATEMENTS

"SEC. 18. (a) Any person who shall make or cause to be made any statement in any application, report, or document filed pursuant to this title or any rule or regulation thereunder, which statement was at the time and in the light of the circumstances under which it was made false or misleading with respect to any material fact, shall be liable to any person (not knowing that such statement was false or misleading) who, in reliance upon such statement, shall have purchased or sold a security at a price which was affected by such statement, for damages caused by such reliance, unless the person sued shall prove that he acted in good faith and had no knowledge that such statement was false or misleading. A person seeking to enforce such liability may sue at law or in equity in any court of competent jurisdiction. In any such suit the court may, in its discretion, require an undertaking for the payment of the costs of such suit, and assess reasonable costs, including reasonable attorneys' fees, against either party litigant.

"(b) Every person who becomes liable to make payment under this section may recover contribution as in cases of contract from any person who, if joined in the original suit, would have been liable to make the same payment.

"(c) No action shall be maintained to enforce any liability created under this section unless brought within 1 year after the discovery of the facts constituting the cause of action and within 3 years after such cause of action accrued.

"POWERS WITH RESPECT TO EXCHANGES AND SECURITIES

"SEC. 19. (a) The Commission is authorized, if in its opinion such action is necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors—

"(1) After appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, by order to suspend for a period not exceeding 12 months or to withdraw the registration of a national securities exchange if the Commission finds that such exchange has violated any provision of this title or of the rules and regulations thereunder or has failed to enforce, so far as is within its power, compliance therewith by a member or by an issuer of a security registered thereon.

"(2) After appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, by order to deny, to suspend the effective date of, to suspend for a period not exceeding 12 months, or to withdraw, the registration of a security if the Commission finds that the issuer of such security has failed to comply with any provision of this title or the rules and regulations thereunder.

"(3) After appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, by order to suspend for a period not exceeding 12 months or to expel from a national securities exchange any member or officer thereof whom the Commission finds has violated any provision of this title or the rules and regulations thereunder, or has effected any transaction for any other person who, he has reason to believe, is violating in respect of such transaction any provision of this title or the rules and regulations thereunder.

"(4) And if in its opinion the public interest so requires, summarily to suspend trading in any registered security on any national securities exchange for a period not exceeding 10 days, or with the approval of the President, summarily to suspend all trading on any national securities exchange for a period not exceeding 90 days.

"(b) The Commission is further authorized, if after making appropriate request in writing to a national securities exchange that such exchange effect on its own behalf specified changes in its rules and practices, and after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, the Commission determines that such exchange has not made the changes so requested, and that such changes are necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors or to insure fair dealing in securities traded in upon such exchange or to insure fair administration of such exchange, by rules or regulations or by order to alter or supplement the rules of such exchange (insofar as necessary or appropriate to effect such changes) in respect of such matters as (1) safeguards in respect of the financial responsibility of members and adequate provision against the evasion of financial responsibility through the use of corporate forms or special partnerships; (2) the limitation or prohibition of the registration or trading in any security within a specified period after the issuance or primary distribution thereof; (3) the listing or striking from listing of any security; (4) hours of trading; (5) the manner, method, and place of soliciting business; (6) fictitious or numbered accounts; (7) the time and method of making settlements, payments, and deliveries and of closing accounts; (8) the reporting of transactions on the exchange and upon tickers maintained by or with the consent of the exchange, including the method of reporting short sales, stopped sales, sales of securities of issuers in default, bankruptcy or receivership, and sales involving other special circumstances; (9) the fixing of reasonable rates of commission, interest, listing, and other charges; (10) minimum units of trading; (11) odd-lot purchases and sales; (12) minimum deposits on margin accounts; and (13) similar matters.

"(c) The Commission is authorized and directed to make a study and investigation of the rules of national securities exchanges with respect to the classification of members, the methods of election of officers and committees to insure a fair representation of the membership, and the suspension, expulsion, and disciplining of members of such exchanges. The Commission shall report to the Congress on or before January 3, 1935, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

"LIABILITIES OF CONTROLLING PERSONS

"SEC. 20. (a) Every person who, directly or indirectly, controls any person liable under any provision of this title or of any rule or regulation thereunder shall also be liable jointly and severally with and to the same extent as such controlled person to any person to whom such controlled person is liable, unless the controlling person acted in good faith and did not directly or indirectly induce the act or acts constituting the violation or cause of action.

"(b) It shall be unlawful for any person, directly or indirectly, to do any act or thing which it would be unlawful for such person to do under the provisions of this title or any rule or regulation thereunder through or by means of any other person.

"(c) It shall be unlawful for any director or officer of, or any owner of any of the securities issued by, any issuer of any security registered on a national securities exchange, without just cause to hinder, delay, or obstruct the making or filing of any document, report, or information, required to be filed under this title or any rule or regulation thereunder.

"INVESTIGATIONS; INJUNCTIONS AND PROSECUTION OF OFFENSES

"SEC. 21. (a) The Commission may, in its discretion, make such investigations as it deems necessary to determine whether any person has violated or is about to violate any provision of this title or any rule or regulation thereunder, and may require or permit any person to file with it a statement in writing, under oath or otherwise as the Commission shall determine, as to all the facts and circumstances concerning the matter to be investigated. The Commission is authorized, in its discretion, to publish information concerning any such violations, and to investigate any facts, conditions, practices, or matters which it may deem necessary or proper to aid in the enforcement of the provisions of this title, in the prescribing of rules and regulations thereunder, or in securing information to serve as a basis for recommending further legislation concerning the matters to which this title relates.

"(b) For the purpose of any such investigation, or any other proceeding under this title, any member of the Commission or any officer designated by it is empowered to administer oaths and affirmations, subpena witnesses, compel their attendance, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, or other records which the Commission deems relevant or material to the inquiry. Such attendance of witnesses and the production of any such records may be required from any place in the United States or any State at any designated place of hearing.

"(c) In case of contumacy by, or refusal to obey a subpena issued to, any person, the Commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such investigation or proceeding is carried on, or where such person resides or carries on business, in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, and other records. And such court may issue an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission or member or officer designated by the Commission, there to produce records, if so ordered, or to give testimony touching the matter under investigation or in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. All process in any such case may be served in the judicial district whereof such person is an inhabitant or wherever he may be found. Any person who shall, without just cause, fail or refuse to attend and testify or to answer any lawful inquiry or to produce books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, and other records, if in his power so to do, in obedience to the subpena of the Commission, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than 1 year, or both.

"(d) No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, contracts, agreements, and other records and documents before the Commission, or in obedience to the subpena of the Commission or any member thereof or any officer designated by it, or in any cause or proceeding instituted by the Commission, on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no individual shall be prosecuted or subject to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, except that such individual so testifying shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

"(e) Whenever it shall appear to the Commission that any person is engaged or about to engage in any acts or practices which constitute or will constitute a violation of the provisions of this title, or of any rule or regulation thereunder, it may in its discretion bring an action in the proper district court of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, or the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, to enjoin such acts or practices, and upon a proper showing a permanent or temporary injunction or restraining order shall be granted without bond. The Commission may transmit such evidence as may be available concerning such acts or practices to the Attorney General, who may, in his discretion, institute the necessary criminal proceedings under this title.

"(f) Upon application of the Commission the district courts of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, shall also have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person to comply with the provisions of this title or any order of the Commission made in pursuance thereof.

"HEARINGS BY COMMISSION

"SEC. 22. Hearings may be public and may be held before the Commission, any member or members thereof, or any officer or officers of the Commission designated by it, and appropriate records thereof shall be kept.

"RULES AND REGULATIONS; ANNUAL REPORTS

"SEC. 23. (a) The Commission and the Federal Reserve Board shall each have power to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the execution of the functions vested in them by this title, and may for such purpose classify issuers, securities, exchanges, and other persons or matters within their respective jurisdiction.

"(b) The Commission and the Federal Reserve Board, respectively, shall include in their annual reports to Congress such information, data, and recommendation for further legislation as they may deem advisable with regard to matters within their respective jurisdictions under this title.

"INFORMATION FILED WITH THE COMMISSION

"SEC. 24. (a) Nothing in this title shall be construed to require, or to authorize the Commission to require, the revealing of trade secrets or processes in any application, report, or document filed with the Commission under this title.

"(b) Any person filing any such application, report, or document may make written objection to the public disclosure of information contained therein, stating the grounds for such objection, and the Commission is authorized to hear objections in any such case where it deems it advisable. The Commission may, in such cases, make available to the public the information contained in any such application, report, or document only when in its judgment a disclosure of such information is in the public interest; and copies of information so made available may be furnished to any person at such reasonable charge and under such reasonable limitations as the Commission may prescribe.

"(c) It shall be unlawful for any member, officer, or employee of the Commission to disclose to any person other than a member, officer, or employee of the Commission, or to use for personal benefit, any information contained in any application, report, or document filed with the Commission which is not made available to the public pursuant to subsection (b) of this section: Provided, That the Commission may make available to the Federal Reserve Board any information requested by the Board for the purpose of enabling it to perform its duties under this title.

"COURT REVIEW OF ORDERS

"SEC. 25. (a) Any person aggrieved by an order issued by the Commission in a proceeding under this title to which such person is a party may obtain a review of such order in the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States, within any circuit wherein such person resides or has his principal place of business, or in the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, by filing in such court, within 60 days after the entry of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Commission be modified or set aside in whole or in part. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon any member of the Commission, and thereupon the Commission shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the record upon which the order complained of was entered. Upon the filing of such transcript such court shall have exclusive jurisdiction to affirm, modify, and enforce or set aside such order, in whole or in part. No objection to the order of the Commission shall be considered by the court unless such objection shall have been urged before the Commission. The finding of the Commission as to the facts, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Commission, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Commission and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as to the court may seem proper. The Commission may modify its findings as to the facts, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by substantial evidence, shall be conclusive, and its recommendation, if any, for the modification or setting aside of the original order. The judgment and decree of the court, affirming, modifying, and enforcing or setting aside, in whole or in part, any such order of the Commission, shall be final, subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., title 28, secs. 346 and 347).

"(b) The commencement of proceedings under subsection (a) shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Commission's order.

"UNLAWFUL REPRESENTATIONS

"SEC. 26. No action or failure to act by the Commission or the Federal Reserve Board, in the administration of this title shall be construed to mean that the particular authority has in any way passed upon the merits of, or given approval to, any security or any transaction or transactions therein, nor shall such action or failure to act with regard to any statement or report filed with or examined by such authority pursuant to this title or rules and regulations thereunder, be deemed a finding by such authority that such statement or report is true and accurate on its face or that it is not false or misleading. It shall be unlawful to make, or cause to be made, to any prospective purchaser or seller of a security any representation that any such action or failure to act by any such authority is to be so construed or has such effect.

"JURISDICTION OF OFFENSES AND SUITS

"SEC. 27. The district courts of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall have exclusive jurisdiction of violations of this title or the rules and regulations thereunder, and of all suits in equity and actions at law brought to enforce any liability or duty created by this title or the rules and regulations thereunder. Any criminal proceeding may be brought in the district wherein any act or transaction constituting the violation occurred. Any suit or action to enforce any liability or duty created by this title or rules and regulations thereunder, or to enjoin any violation of such title or rules and regulations, may be brought in any such district or in the district wherein the defendant is found or is an inhabitant or transacts business, and process in such cases may be served in any other district of which the defendant is an inhabitant or wherever the defendant may be found. Judgments and decrees so rendered shall be subject to review as provided in sections 128 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U.S.C., title 28, secs. 225 and 347). No costs shall be assessed for or against the Commission in any proceeding under this title brought by or against it in the Supreme Court or such other courts.

"EFFECT ON EXISTING LAW

"SEC. 28. (a) The rights and remedies provided by this title shall be in addition to any and all other rights and remedies that may exist at law or in equity; but no person permitted to maintain a suit for damages under the provisions of this title shall recover, through satisfaction of judgment in one or more actions, a total amount in excess of his actual damages on account of the act complained of. Nothing in this title shall affect the jurisdiction of the securities commission (or any agency or officer performing like functions) of any State over any security or any person insofar as it does not conflict with the provisions of this title or the rules and regulations thereunder.

"(b) Nothing in this title shall be construed to modify existing law (1) with regard to the binding effect on any member of any exchange of any action taken by the authorities of such exchange to settle disputes between its members, or (2) with regard to the binding effect of such action on any person who has agreed to be bound thereby, or (3) with regard to the binding effect on any such member of any disciplinary action taken by the authorities of the exchange as a result of violation of any rule of the exchange, insofar as the action taken is not inconsistent with the provisions of this title or the rules and regulations thereunder.

"SEC. 29. (a) Any condition, stipulation, or provision binding any person to waive compliance with any provision of this title or of any rule or regulation thereunder, or of any rule of an exchange required thereby shall be void.

"(b) Every contract made in violation of any provision of this title or of any rule or regulation thereunder, and every contract (including any contract for listing a security on an exchange) heretofore or hereafter made the performance of which involves the violation of, or the continuance of any relationship or practice in violation of, any provision of this title or any rule or regulation thereunder, shall be void (1) as regards the rights of any person who, in violation of any such provision, rule, or regulation, shall have made or engaged in the performance of any such contract, and (2) as regards the rights of any person who, not being a party to such contract, shall have acquired any right thereunder with actual knowledge of the facts by reason of which the making or performance of such contract was in violation of any such provision, rule or regulation.

"(c) Nothing in this title shall be construed (1) to affect the validity of any loan or extension of credit (or any extension or renewal thereof) made or of any lien created prior or subsequent to the enactment of this title, unless at the time of the making of such loan or extension of credit (or extension or renewal thereof) or the creating of such lien, the person making such loan or extension of credit (or extension or renewal thereof) or acquiring such lien shall have actual knowledge of facts by reason of which the making of such loan or extension of credit (or extension or renewal thereof) or the acquisition of such lien is a violation of the provisions of this title or any rule or regulation thereunder, or (2) to afford a defense to the collection of any debt or obligation or the enforcement of any lien by any person who shall have acquired such debt, obligation, or lien in good faith for value and without actual knowledge of the violation of any provision of this title or any rule or regulation thereunder affecting the legality of such debt, obligation, or lien.

"FOREIGN SECURITIES EXCHANGES

"SEC. 30. (a) It shall be unlawful for any broker or dealer, directly or indirectly, to make use of the mails or of any means or instrumentality of interstate commerce for the purpose of effecting on an exchange not within or subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, any transaction in any security the issuer of which is a resident of, or is organ-

"(b) The provisions of this title or of any rule or regulation thereunder shall not apply to any person insofar as he transacts a business in securities without the jurisdiction of the United States, unless he transacts such business in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe as necessary or appropriate to prevent the evasion of this title.

"SEC. 31. Every national securities exchange shall pay to the Commission on or before March 15 of each calendar year a registration fee for the privilege of doing business as a national securities exchange during the preceding calendar year or any part thereof. Such fee shall be in an amount equal to one five-hundredths of 1 percent of the aggregate dollar amount of the sales of securities transacted on such national securities exchange during the preceding calendar year and subsequent to its registration as a national securities exchange.

"PENALTIES

"SEC. 32. Any person who willfully violates any provision of this title, or any rule or regulation thereunder the violation of which is made unlawful or the observance of which is required under the terms of this title, or any person who willfully and knowingly makes, or causes to be made, any statement in any application, report, or document required to be filed under this title or any rule or regulation thereunder, which statement was false or misleading with respect to any material fact, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both, except that when such person is an exchange, a fine not exceeding $500,000 may be imposed; but no person shall be subject to imprisonment under this section for the violation of any rule or regulation if he proves that he had no knowledge of such rule or regulation.

"SEC. 206. (a) Section 11 (a) of such act is amended by adding after the last line thereof the following new sentence: 'If such person acquired the security after the issuer has made generally available to its security holders an earning statement covering a period of at least 12 months beginning after the effective date of the registration statement, then the right of recovery under this subsection shall be conditioned on proof that such person acquired the security relying upon such untrue statement in the registration statement or relying upon the registration statement and not knowing of such omission, but such reliance may be established without proof of the reading of the registration statement by such person.'

"(b) Clauses (C) and (D) of paragraph (3) of section 11 (b) of such act are amended to read as follows: '(C) as regards any part of the registration statement purporting to be made on the authority of an expert (other than himself) or purporting to be a copy of or extract from a report or valuation of an expert (other than himself), he had no reasonable ground to believe and did not believe, at the time such part of the registration statement became effective, that the statements therein were untrue or that there was an omission to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, or that such part of the registration statement did not fairly represent the statement of the expert or was not a fair copy of or extract from the report or valuation of the expert; and (D) as regards any part of the registration statement purporting to be a statement made by an official person or purporting to be a copy of or extract from a public official document, he had no reasonable ground to believe and did not believe, at the time such part of the registration statement became effective, that the statements therein were untrue, or that there was an omission to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, or that such part of the registration statement did not fairly represent the statement made by the official person or was not a fair copy of or extract from the public official document.'

"(c) Subsection (c) of such section 11 is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) In determining, for the purpose of paragraph (3) of subsection (b) of this section, what constitutes reasonable investigation and reasonable ground for belief, the standard of reasonableness shall be that required of a prudent man in the management of his own property.'

"(d) Subsection (e) of such section 11 is amended to read as follows:

"'(e) The suit authorized under subsection (a) may be to recover such damages as shall represent the difference between the amount paid for the security (not exceeding the price at which the security was offered to the public) and (1) the value thereof as of the time such suit was brought, or (2) the price at which such security shall have been disposed of in the market before suit, or (3) the price at which such security shall have been disposed of after suit but before judgment if such damages shall be less than the damages representing the difference between the amount paid for the security (not exceeding the price at which the security was offered to the public) and the value thereof as of the time such suit was brought: Provided, That if the defendant proves that any portion or all of such damages represents other than the depreciation in value of such security resulting from such part of the registration statement, with respect to which his liability is asserted, not being true or omitting to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading, such portion of or all such damages shall not be recoverable. In no event shall any underwriter (unless such underwriter shall have knowingly received from the issuer for acting as an underwriter some benefit, directly or indirectly, in which all other underwriters similarly situated did not share in proportion to their respective interests in the underwriting) be liable in any suit or as a consequence of suits authorized under subsection (a) for damages in excess of the total price at which the securities underwritten by him and distributed to the public were offered to the public. In any suit under this or any other section of this title the court may, in its discretion, require an undertaking for the payment of the costs of such suit, including reasonable attorney's fees, and if judgment shall be rendered against a party litigant, upon the motion of the other party litigant, such costs may be assessed in favor of such party litigant (whether or not such undertaking has been required) if the court believes the suit or the defense to have been without merit, in an amount sufficient to reimburse him for the reasonable expenses incurred by him, in connection with such suit, such costs to be taxed in the manner usually provided for taxing of costs in the court in which the suit was heard.'

"SEC. 207. Section 13 of such act is amended (a) by striking out '2 years' wherever it appears therein and inserting in lieu thereof '1 year'; (b) by striking out '10 years' and inserting in lieu thereof '3 years'; and (c) by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: 'or under section 12 (2) more than 3 years after the sale.'

"SEC. 208. Section 15 of such act is amended by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: 'unless the controlling person had no knowledge of or reasonable ground to believe in the existence of the facts by reason of which the liability of the controlled person is alleged to exist.'

"SEC. 209. (a) The first sentence of subsection (a) of section 19 of such act is amended by inserting after the word 'accounting' a comma and the word 'technical.'

"(b) Subsection (a) of such section 19 is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: 'No provision of this title imposing any liability shall apply to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any rule or regulation of the Commission, notwithstanding that such rule or regulation may, after such act or omission, be amended or rescinded or be determined by judicial or other authority to be invalid for any reason.'

"SEC. 210. Upon the expiration of 60 days after the date upon which a majority of the members of the Securities and Exchange Commission appointed under section 4 of title I of this act have qualified and taken office, all powers, duties, and functions of the Federal Trade Commission under the Securities Act of 1933 shall be transferred to such Commission, together with all property, books, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations used by or available to the Federal Trade Commission for carrying out its functions under the Securities Act of 1933. All proceedings, hearings, or investigations commenced or pending before the Federal Trade Commission arising under the Securities Act of 1933 shall be continued by the Securities and Exchange Commission. All orders, rules, and regulations which have been issued by the Federal Trade Commission under the Securities Act of 1933 and which are in effect shall continue in effect until modified, superseded, revoked, or repealed. All rights and interests accruing or to accrue under the Securities Act of 1933, or any provision of any regulation relating to, or out of action taken by, the Federal Trade Commission under such act, shall be followed in all respects and may be exercised and enforced.

"SEC. 211. The Commission is authorized and directed to make a study and investigation of the work, activities, personnel, and functions of protective and reorganization committees in connection with the reorganization, readjustment, rehabilitation, liquidation, or consolidation of persons and properties and to report the result of its studies and investigations and its recommendations to the Congress on or before January 3, 1936."

And the Senate agree to the same.

RICIPROCAL-TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

AMERICAN IMPERIALISTIC FINANCE

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to discuss this tariff question in connection with our Latin American problems and the Cuban involvements.

A few days ago we were presented with a resolution seeking to prevent the shipment of munitions and war supplies to Paraguay and Bolivia. That resolution, I am convinced, had behind it a good purpose and was offered with a good intent. We agreed to the resolution with very little debate.

Some few months before that resolution was offered, we were concerned with a Cuban revolution, and considerable action has been taken by the Congress and by our executive department on account of the Cuban embroilment.

I wish to be heard with regard to what is involved in the Paraguay-Bolivia war. As is usually the case, it is the forces of imperialistic finance which are today responsible for the war between Bolivia and Paraguay, and it is the financial interests of this country which are responsible, in large measure, for the conditions prevailing in Cuba.

I have before me a brief memorandum showing what the present war between Paraguay and Bolivia involves. Only recently considerable oil development has occurred in what is known as the "Chaco area" of Paraguay. Paraguay is served by a navigable river, known as the "River Paraguay", which flows along the border line of Argentina and Brazil and Paraguay and empties into the Atlantic Ocean.

The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, an American corporation, the promoter of revolutions in Central America, South America, and Mexico ever since they have wanted oil concessions, has found it necessary to have the Chaco territory. The Chaco territory has been adjudicated to belong to Paraguay, and has been held to be Paraguayan property so long that there is practically no reasonable person who entertains any doubt as to who is the owner of the Chaco.

As far back as 1874 a controversy arose between Argentina and Paraguay as to who owned the Chaco territory, and the United States was called in to mediate the dispute. The President of the United States at that time, President Rutherford B. Hayes, rendered a report, in which he held that Paraguay—to use his own words—"has a just and legal title to the Chaco territory." That was not only recognized by Argentina, it was not only recognized by Paraguay, it was recognized by Bolivia, and was held to be the basis of ownership on which the United States predicated everything it did relating to South American controversies over the Chaco territory. There is an agreement in effect today, we are told, recognizing the Chaco territory as a part of the Paraguayan Government's domain.

But, Mr. President, they have discovered oil in the Chaco and Bolivia. It seems that it will cost considerable money for them to reach the deep water with the oil of the Standard Oil Co. which has been discovered in Bolivia, and, therefore, Bolivia finds itself in need of a pipe line route to navigable Paraguayan rivers, which it does not want to acquire on such terms and conditions as will be required by the Paraguayan Government.

Not only that but the territory of the Chaco itself is rich in natural resources and probably in mineral deposits. So a war has broken out, financed by whom? The war is between Bolivia, a country with around 3,000,000 population, fighting against Paraguay, a country with a population of probably less than 1,000,000 people, although their population is largely transitory; many of its people are employed seasonally in some of the countries around Paraguay for the planting and gathering of crops. But the Standard Oil Co. of the United States and other affiliated interests have been guilty of promoting this war and financing Bolivia, for no purpose under God's sun than to take that territory away from that little Latin American country which America already has held owns the Chaco. Time after time America has adjudicated the differences and held that it was Paraguayan territory, and Bolivia has recognized it, Argentina has recognized it, and the United States has recognized it, Mr. President, now for a period of almost 60 years. Notwithstanding that fact, we came in here the other day with a resolution by which we professed to declare our neutrality.

What develops? It develops, so I am reliably informed, from persons who have reason to know, that Bolivia had, with the aid of the Standard Oil Co., largely equipped itself with the munitions of war and other combustibles necessary to carry on its offensive war against Paraguay. Paraguay has not gone one foot into the Bolivian territory. Mr. President, every foot of advance has been by the Bolivian Army.

I have in my hand an official document published by the Bolivian Government. Here is a contract entered into by the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, an American corporation, in which it has agreed to furnish the petroleum and gasoline necessary to Bolivia in order for that country to carry on its offensive warfare against Paraguay. The document is in Spanish, but I will read the translation of part of it.

Four hundred thousand liters of gasoline (approximately 100,000 gallons) for aviation and 800,000 for trucks monthly. (Approximately 200,000 gallons.)

We reproduce a continuation of the decree in respect to the Bolivian Government that we take from El Diario, of La Paz, edition of the 14th of March past.

The executive has given the following supreme decree:

Seen and considered:

The necessity of consuming preferably national gasoline for the needs of the campaign (war), and greater reason due to the considerable increase of consumption that will be caused by the securing of new motor units and of aviation:

That an agreement has been arrived at with the Standard Oil Co. of Bolivia.

It is known, Mr. President, that they always pretend to be a company and a product of the particular country or part of the country they are ravishing, just as when they were freezing out the territory of Louisiana, the Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana claimed itself to be the product of our native territory down there, against whose citizens they were conducting a pipe-line embargo at the time.

That an agreement had been arrived at with the Standard Oil Co. of Bolivia that is agreeable. In fixing the price for gasoline, for trucks and for aviation and for kerosene and in virtue of this (due to fixing the price) the company will increase its distillation of these products—

They will increase it, Mr. President, in price because they need it down there for war at this time—until arriving at almost the total fiscal consumption, being repaid with these prices for the expenses incurred because of these new installations.

I am not going to read further. I have read enough so the Senate may know that my remarks in this respect are verified, but I am sending to the desk the Spanish text and the translation, Mr. President, and ask that at the conclusion of my remarks they may be printed in the RECORD in parallel columns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the United States is practically a party to this war that is being carried on at this time against Paraguay in Latin America. This Government, which has asserted itself as a protector; this Government, which has held itself out as a big brother; this country, which has ever refereed the dispute and awarded the title and the ownership of that Chaco territory, which is in area about the size of the State of Louisiana, to Paraguay, has allowed a capitalistic interest because of the fact that it has an oil field in Bolivia and because of the fact that part of the Paraguay territory is rich in mineral deposits and other natural resources—because of those facts it has allowed this Standard Oil outfit to go down into that country, corrupting the Bolivian Government when it could not corrupt the Paraguayan Government, to carry on an aggressive warfare, and that outfit has furnished munitions and supplies with which to conduct the war down there today.

The United States Government, after Bolivia has been supplied with the necessary munitions of war and combustibles necessary to carry on an aggressive warfare into the territory of Paraguay, into the territory which the United States as a referee has adjudicated was territory of Paraguay, which has been recognized by Argentina, which has been recognized by Brazil, which has been recognized by Bolivia under the decrees of the United States, has now folded its hands and declared its neutrality, with its capitalistic interests of the Standard Oil Co. down there trying to steal this territory from poor little Paraguay with a population of only 850,000.

These murderers have gone down there and hired their assassins. This same element, which knows no such thing as human propriety, which is exploiting this people in revolution after revolution, if it has the big capitalistic interests of Wall Street on its side, care nothing about the referee decision of the President of the United States. To that element the decision does not amount to a tinker's dam; does not amount to as much as the paper on which it is written. And the best that we have done is that we have folded our arms in a majestic, blissful neutrality, after Bolivia has been financed by the Standard Oil Co. and entered into an open contract to furnish them with the combustibles necessary for the war, and America is now going to shut off little Paraguay, which has not got the money, anyway, which country is today being invaded by Bolivia, financed by the Standard Oil Co. of the United States.

Mr. President, that is the blissful kind of Government policy that we adopted the other day, and our newspapers and the people generally were taken in by the proposition declaring ourselves to be a neutral, thinking ourselves a marvelous, peace-loving country, and the Standard Oil Co. down in that country financing a foreign army, importing soldiers into that country, giving them the munitions, trying to take away country from Paraguay because the Paraguayan Government cannot be corrupted by the Standard Oil Co., and Standard Oil has the Bolivian Government under its heels.

If we allow a thing of this kind to go on, Mr. President, if this country allows its imperialistic masters of finance to go on, the embroilments in which this country is going to be concerned will be insurmountable.

They have undertaken to claim that there is some foreign interest interfering in the matter; that the Dutch Shell Oil Co. is a British interest and is concerned down there. How long do they think they can fool people with that statement?

Mr. President, the Dutch Shell Oil Co., which they call a British company, is affiliated in companies down there with the Standard Oil Co. of the United States too often to have anybody question it. There are too many common ownerships down there, too many joint ownerships of stock in companies down there exploiting the Latin American countries for anybody to be fooled by such a statement which they are trying to foist upon the American people. There is nothing to that statement whatever.

Mr. President, here is the decree of America. Here is the referee's decision which the United States made back here 40 years ago. Here is the territory which was allotted to Paraguay. It is Paraguay's territory. It always has been Paraguay's territory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired.

Mr. LONG. I will take my 20 minutes on the bill.

I read from a report on this matter:

Bolivia has invaded the zone—

Mr. President, according to this report—that President Hayes adjudicated to Paraguay—

That is not disputed—and has taken possession of it manu militari.

That is, by force of arms.

Bolivia has violated not only the Hayes decision but also the pact of the statu quo which she signed with Paraguay in Buenos Aires in 1907. Bolivia has done this notwithstanding the fact that she has renewed in five successive protocols the statu quo pact of 1907. And what is more, the pact of 1907 is in full legal force even up to this very day.

All of which was founded on the decision made by President Rutherford B. Hayes in 1874, when there was a controversy between Argentina and Paraguay at that time when this great country of the Argentine made as though it would take this territory away from that little power, Paraguay. But they have gone to Bolivia, a country with 3,000,000 people, where they have acquired all the oil concessions, and it is easy, Mr. President, as I understand the topography of that country, for them to get their pipe line out to the sea nearly as easy as it is to take the pipe line down through Paraguay to the River Paraguay, which is navigable, and leading into the Atlantic Ocean, and probably the Chaco territory as a part of Paraguay is also so valuable that it becomes important to the Standard Oil Co.'s business.

While I am speaking of Paraguay, Mr. President, I will say that this has also been our policy with Mexico to some extent, but more recently it has been our policy with Nicaragua, and it has been our policy with some other countries down there. It has been openly flaunted here in this American Congress time after time that when they get ready to take certain fruit lands away from certain countries down in Central America, to do that, to make secure the titles and vesting them sufficiently satisfactory to them, they employ revolutionists to do it.

Now we come to Cuba. What is the trouble with Cuba today? Mr. President, the trouble with Cuba today is simply this:

The Chase National Bank and other financial interests have financed the Cuban Government. They loaned to Machado many millions of dollars, much of which had already been held to be unconstitutionally loaned under the Cuban constitution. The land in Cuba had been parceled out among foreign interests. The Cuban Governments was bonded heels over head. The Chase National Bank, upon seeing that part, if not all, of its money had been illegally loaned, advised its clientele that it had an excellent security in the form of Cuban bonds that they were willing to parcel out among the people of the United States. So, after it had been advised by its own agents that that money was illegally being taken by Machado, they took the bonds they held in their own vaults and sold them to the investing public of the United States at large.

Then came the revolution. After these loans had been parceled out in the United States, a revolution occurred in Cuba; Machado was run out. What did we do? There was a radio address delivered by President Grau in which he said:

I am not going to be recognized as the President of Cuba, due to the fact that the government of which I am the head declines to recognize the validity of certain bonds that were sold to the Chase National Bank and floated by that bank to other parties.

Said Mr. Grau, according to my best recollection of the report of that radio address—

I cannot get recognition for this country, unless I am willing that the Cuban Government, of which I am the head, shall recognize these obligations that have been incurred to the Chase National Bank and to other parties.

President Grau was not recognized. The only man who would be recognized had to be someone who would recognize the Cuban Government as responsible for the loans that were made to Mr. Machado and the government that was headed by him. Therein, Mr. President, lies a further proposition. They are unable to exploit Cuba; Cuba cannot be exploited to the entire sum necessary to retire the obligations of these private interests. What is to be done? They have now come to the proposition that they have got to "take it out of the hide" of the American farmer.

We have a statement from Mr. Machado, who is temporarily residing in this country, as I understand—and I do not have any purpose in keeping him from residing here so long as he wants to, so far as I am concerned—but we have a statement from Mr. Machado that the trouble in Cuba today is the tariff on sugar exported by Cuba to the United States of America.

Here is the United States of America, with sugar being sold within its borders today cheaper than sugar is sold in any other country, undertaking to develop a domestic sugar business; here are interests from Wall Street that have gone into Cuba and have placed hundreds of millions of dollars at the disposal of the Cuban Government and private interests in Cuba. They have acquired, lock, stock, and barrel, nearly everything that Cuba has got inside it; and now, with that white elephant on their hands, in order that they may make whole the Chase National Bank and its affiliates, and make whole the National City Bank and its affiliates, they propose to come now and say to the American farmer, "You have got to stand for the aggression that must be made by our domestic capital invested in a foreign land; we have got to scuttle the market; we have got to scuttle the trade, not only of the Cubans, not only of the Paraguayans, but we have got to scuttle the business of the Americans in order that something may be obtained out of it which probably will make us whole on the realization of the investments we have made."

How long will we stand for this Paraguayan aggression? Is the American Government going to stand idly by and allow the Standard Oil Co. to promote a war, through Bolivia, against Paraguay, for a territory which the United States has already recognized as being a part, and very properly so, of Paraguay? Are we going to sit here and allow that under the pretense of our neutrality? If so, why did we ever enter into any understanding with them, as a big brother, to arbitrate over its territorial integrity of the smaller countries and to prevent such outbreaks as they have there? Why is America so silent? America has never been so blissfully neutral in any other war prevailing in that territory; America has taken some kind of a stand; America has said something; but America is now silent, as silent as the tomb. We are saying nothing because the "big papa" of the American capitalistic system is down there today stealing Paraguay away from the 850,000 natives who own the country. America is perfectly silent, blissfully silent.

I notice that my good friend, whom I have never met, Mr. Vincent Astor, has had a great deal to do with some of these concerns. It is funny, Mr. President, how you connect them up. All you have got to do is to look under the barrel, and you will find the motive every time you look. Mr. Vincent Astor is a director of the Chase National Bank, and there you find all the interest that it is necessary to find. The Chase National Bank, Mr. President, is known as the "Rockefeller bank"; the Rockefeller bank is the Standard Oil bank; the Chase National Bank is the Standard Oil Co.; the Chase National Bank is Rockefeller; Rockefeller is the Standard Oil Co.; the Standard Oil Co. is Rockefeller, and vice versa; all in the same clique. Here is Rockefeller, with one army, stealing Paraguay, taking the Chaco, going in as the aggressor and taking territory adjudicated to be a part of Paraguay 40 years ago; and here is the same Chase National Bank, another Rockefeller institution, reaching over and making them validate illegal bonds sold to the Government of Cuba; and here is America, blissfully silent, retiring constantly, while the private munitions of war are supplied down into those Latin American countries. That is the imperialistic aggression of the Rockefellers and the Chase National Bank and the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. President, if the United States stands by with that kind of thing going on, if the United States permits that kind of alliance to use the processes of this country against its own treaties outside its boundaries, if the United States Government will stand for the Standard Oil Co.'s carrying on this kind of an illegal, unconscionable, murderous, imperialistic design—well should we begin here today, on Memorial Day, the hour of mourning, to understand it, in order that for the first time Memorial Day will have its true spirit and intent as a day of mourning of the American people, not so much for what has been lost in the past—not entirely for that—but for the fact that imperialistic principles, the domination of the Standard Oil Co., and the combination of Vincent Astor, the Rockefellers, and the Chase National Bank have become more mighty than the solemn treaties and pronouncements of the United States Government itself.

CUATROCIENTOS MIL LITROS DE GASOLINA PARA AVIACIÓN Y OCHOCIENTOS MIL PARA CAMIONES, MENSUALMENTE

Reproducimos a continuación el Decreto respectivo del Gobierno Boliviano, que tomamos de "El Diario", de La Paz, edición del 14 de Marzo, p. pdo.:

"El Ejecutivo ha dado el siguiente decreto supremo:

"Vistos y considerando:

"La necesidad de consumir preferentemente gasolina nacional para las necesidades de la campaña, con mayor razón dentro del considerable aumento de consumo que ocasionará la adquisición de nuevas unidades motrices y de aviación;

"Que se ha llegado a convenir un punto de equidad con la Standard Oil Co. of Bolivia, al fijar un precio para la gasolina de camiones y de aviación y para el kerosene, debiendo en tal virtud la compañía aumentar la destilación de estos productos hasta llenar la casi totalidad del consumo fiscal, reembolsándose con dichos precios de los gastos en que incurra con motivo de las nuevas instalaciones;

"Que todas las autoridades tecnicas del Supremo Gobierno han aconsejado aceptar tales precios por ser convenientes en comparación al costo de gasolina importada que se paga en oro;

"Con los informes de la Direción de Obras Públicas; de la Dirección de Transportes y de la Dirección General de Aprovisionamiento de gasolina y lubricantes.

"Se resuelve:

"Articulo 1°: Quedan suspendidos los efectos de la resolución suprema de 31 de octubre de 1932 mediante la cual el estado tomó a su cargo la explotación de los pozos petroliferos de Camiri.

"Articulo 2°: La Standard Oil Co. of Bolivia, en cambio, conforme a su oferta de 7 de diciembre de 1933, presentada al Ministerio de Industria, ampliará sus instalaciones de destilería de petróleo en Bolivia, hasta producir mensualmente cuatrocientos mil litros de gasolina de aviación de superior calidad, tipo 'otano 80', conforme a las especificaciones de la inspección fiscal de petróleos y ochocientos mil litros de gasolina para automóviles, cuyos precios de venta al Supremo Gobierno serán de 45 centavos (moneda nacional), el litro de gasolina de aviación y al mismo precio actual de 18 centavos la gasolina para automóviles. Para el kerosene se fija el precio de 17 centavos el litro. Las ampliaciones de sus destilerías quedarán concluídas y la produción nueva estara disponible en el termino de 90 dias después de notificada esta resolución suprema a la compañía. Todo el residuo proveniente después de la destilación de gasolina y kerosene será de propiedad y entregado libre de todo gasto al Supremo Gobierno.

"Articulo 3°: El Supremo Gobierno consumirá por lo menos 350,000 litros de gasolina de aviación y 700,000 de gasolina para camiones de la producción de la Compañía."

Los pozos de Camirí, pues, han vuelto a poder de la Standard Oil. De allí sale la casi totalidad del combustible que utiliza el enemigo. Demás está decir que el Gobierno Boliviano no abona un solo centavo por la nafta que consume y que el tal contrato no es sino uno de los tantos procedimientos para disimular la protección que presta la empresa a Bolivia, protección que permite a ese país sostener hasta hoy la guerra.

FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND LITERS OF GASOLINE PER MONTH FOR AVIATION AND EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND FOR TRUCKS

[1 liter=one-fifth gallon]

We reproduce in continuation the Decree of the Bolivian Government, which we take from El Diario of La Paz, Bolivia, of March 14, 1934:

"The Executive has given the following supreme decree:

Whereas and considering:

"The necessity of consuming preferentially national gasoline for the necessities of the campaign, along with the greater reason arising from the considerable increase of consumption which the acquisition of new motorized units and aviation will occasion;

"That an equitable agreement has just been arrived at with the Standard Oil Co. of Bolivia to fix a price for gasoline for trucks and aviation and for kerosene, and subsequently in virtue of this the company will increase the distillation of these products enough to fill almost completely the fiscal consumption, reimbursing itself with these prices for the expenses which it will incur because of the new installations;

"That all the technical authorities of the Supreme Government have consented to accept these prices as equitable in comparison with the cost of imported gasoline, for which gold must be paid;

"With the advice of the Department of Public Works, of the Department of Transportation, and of the General Department of Provisions of gasoline and lubricants;

"Be it resolved:

"Article the first: That the effect of the supreme resolution of October 31, 1932, by means of which the state took charge of the exploitation of the oil wells of Camiri, be suspended.

"Article the second: The Standard Oil Co. of Bolivia, in exchange and in conformity with its offer of December 7, 1933, made to the Ministry of Industry, will increase its installations for distilling petroleum in Bolivia until capable of producing monthly 400,000 liters of aviation gasoline of superior quality, of the '80 octane' type, and conforming to the specifications of the fiscal inspection of petroleum; and in addition 800,000 liters of automobile gasoline; the sale prices of these to the Supreme Government will not be more than 45 centavos (Federal currency) per liter for aviation gasoline, and at the same time the actual price of 18 centavos for automobile gasoline. For kerosene the price of 17 centavos per liter is fixed. The enlargement of the distilleries shall be concluded and the new production shall be available at the expiration of 90 days after the notification of the company of this supreme resolution. All the residue remaining after the distillation of the gasoline and kerosene shall be the property of and be delivered free of all cost to the Supreme Government.

"Article the third: The Supreme Government shall consume at least 350,000 liters of aviation gasoline and 700,000 liters of truck gasoline of the production of the company."

The wells of Camiri, then, have returned to the power of Standard Oil. From there goes out almost all the fuel which the enemy uses. Beyond this it is said that the Bolivian Government does not pay a single centavo for the fuel it consumes, and that this contract is nothing but one of the many proceedings to hide the protection the enterprise lends to Bolivia, a protection which permits that country to extend until today the war.

FOREIGN-TRADE ZONES

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9322, which was sent to the Senate from the House of Representatives yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 9322) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign-trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I move to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof Senate bill 2001, which we passed a few weeks ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That when used in this act—

The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Commerce;

The term "public corporation" means a State, a legal subdivision thereof, or a municipality, or a lawfully authorized public agency of a State or municipality, or a corporate municipal instrumentality of one or more States;

(b) In case of any State in which harbor facilities of any port of entry are owned and controlled by the State and in which State harbor facilities of any other port of entry are owned and controlled by a municipality. The Secretary shall not grant an application by any public corporation or person for the establishment of any zone in such State, unless such application has been authorized by an act of the legislature of such State (enacted after the date of enactment of this act).

SEC. 3. Foreign and domestic merchandise of every description, except such as is prohibited by law, may, without being subject to the customs laws of the United States, except as otherwise provided in this act, be brought into a zone and there stored, exhibited, broken up, repacked, assembled, distributed, sorted, refined, graded, cleaned, mixed with foreign or domestic merchandise or otherwise manipulated, and be exported, and foreign merchandise may be sent into customs territory of the United States therefrom, in the original package or otherwise; but when foreign merchandise is so sent from a zone into customs territory of the United States it shall be subject to the laws and regulations of the United States affecting imported merchandise: Provided, That when the privilege shall be requested the collector of customs shall supervise the unlading of foreign merchandise in the zone, cause such merchandise or any portion thereof to be appraised and the duties liquidated thereon. Thereafter it may be stored or manipulated under the supervision and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and within 2 years after such unlading such merchandise, whether mixed with domestic merchandise or not, may be sent into customs territory upon the payment of such liquidated duties thereon; and if not so sent into customs territory within such period of 2 years such merchandise shall be disposed of under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and out of the proceeds the duties shall be paid and the remainder, if any, to be delivered to the owners of the property: Provided further, That subject to such regulations respecting identity and safeguarding of the revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, and articles previously imported on which duty has been paid, or which have been admitted free of duty, may be taken into a zone from the customs territory of the United States, and may be brought back thereto free of duty, whether or not they have been combined with or made part, while in such zone, of other articles: Provided, That if in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury their identity has not been lost, such articles not entitled to free entry by reason of noncompliance with the requirements made hereunder by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be treated, when they reenter the customs territory of the United States, as foreign merchandise under the provisions of the tariff laws in force at that time.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Treasury shall assign to the zone the necessary customs officers and guards to protect the revenue and to provide for the admission of foreign merchandise into customs territory.

SEC. 5. Vessels entering or leaving a zone shall be subject to the operation of all the laws of the United States, except as otherwise provided in this act, and vessels leaving a zone and arriving in customs territory of the United States shall be subject to such regulations to protect the revenue as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed in any manner so as to permit vessels under foreign flags to carry goods or merchandise from one foreign trade zone to another zone or port in the protected coastwise trade of the United States.

SEC. 6. Each application shall state in detail—

(1) The location and qualifications of the area in which it is proposed to establish a zone, showing (a) the land and water or land or water area or land area alone if the application is for its establishment in or adjacent to an interior port; (b) the means of segregation from customs territory; (c) the fitness of the area for a zone; and (d) the possibilities of expansion of the zone area.

(2) The facilities and appurtenances which it is proposed to provide and the preliminary plans and estimate of the cost thereof, and the existing facilities and appurtenances which it is proposed to utilize.

(3) The time within which the applicant proposes to commence and complete the construction of the zone and facilities and appurtenances.

(4) The methods proposed to finance the undertaking.

(5) Such other information as the Secretary may require.

The Secretary may upon his own initiative or upon request permit the amendment of the application. Any expansion of the area of an established zone shall be made and approved in the same manner as an original application.

SEC. 7. If the Secretary finds that the proposed plans and location are suitable for the accomplishment of the purpose of a foreign trade zone under this act and that the facilities and appurtenances which it is proposed to provide are sufficient, he shall make the grant. If the Secretary refuses the grant, the applicant may appeal to a board consisting of the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War, whose decision shall be rendered within 3 months from the filing of such appeal and be final as to the grant of the application.

SEC. 8. The Secretary shall prescribe such rules and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act or the rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury made hereunder and as may be necessary to carry out this act.

SEC. 9. The Secretary shall cooperate with the State subdivision, and municipality in which the zone is located in the exercise of their police, sanitary, and other powers in and in connection with the free zone. He shall also cooperate with the United States Customs Service, the Post Office Department, the Public Health Service, the Bureau of Immigration, and such other Federal agencies as have jurisdiction in ports of entry described in section 2.

SEC. 10. For the purpose of facilitating the investigations of the Secretary and his work in the granting of the privilege, in the establishment, operation, and maintenance of a zone, the President may direct the executive departments and other establishments of the Government to cooperate with the Secretary, and for such purpose each of the several departments and establishments is authorized, upon direction of the President, to furnish to the Secretary such records, papers, and information in their possession as may be required by him, and temporarily to detail to the service of the Secretary such officers, experts, or engineers as may be necessary.

SEC. 11. If the title to or right of user of any of the property to be included in a zone is in the United States, an agreement to use such property for zone purposes may be entered into between the grantee and the department or officer of the United States having control of the same, under such conditions approved by the Secretary and such department or officer, as may be agreed upon.

SEC. 12. Each grantee shall provide and maintain in connection with the zone—

(a) Adequate slips, docks, wharves, warehouses, loading and unloading and mooring facilities where the zone is adjacent to water; or in the case of an inland zone, adequate loading, unloading, and warehouse facilities;

(b) Adequate transportation connections with the surrounding territory and with all parts of the United States, so arranged as to permit of proper guarding and inspection for the protection of the revenue;

(c) Adequate facilities for coal or other fuel and for light and power;

(d) Adequate water and sewer mains;

(e) Adequate quarters and facilities for the officers and employees of the United States, State, and municipality whose duties may require their presence within the zone;

(f) Adequate enclosures to segregate the zone from customs territory for protection of the revenue, together with suitable provisions for ingress and egress of persons, conveyances, vessels, and merchandise;

(g) Such other facilities as may be required by the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury, acting jointly.

SEC. 13. The grantee may, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of the Treasury, and under reasonable and uniform regulations for like conditions and circumstances to be prescribed by them, permit private persons, firms, corporations, or associations to erect such buildings and other structures within the zone as will meet their particular requirements: Provided, That such permission shall not constitute a vested right as against the United States, nor interfere with the regulation of the grantee or the permittee by the United States, nor interfere with or complicate the revocation of the grant by the United States: And provided further, That in the event of the United States or the grantee desiring to acquire the property of the permittee no goodwill shall be considered as accruing from the privilege granted to the zone: And provided further, That such permits shall not be granted on terms that conflict with the public use of the zone as set forth in this act.

SEC. 14. Each zone shall be operated as a public utility, and all rates and charges for all services or privileges within the zone shall be fair and reasonable, and the grantee shall afford to all who may apply for the use of the zone and its facilities and appurtenances uniform treatment under like conditions, subject to such treaties or commercial conventions as are now in force or may hereafter be made from time to time by the United States with foreign governments and the cost of maintaining the additional customs service required under this act shall be paid by the operator of the zone.

SEC. 15. No individual shall be allowed to reside within the zone except Federal, State, or municipal officers or agents whose resident presence is deemed necessary by the Secretary.

The Secretary shall prescribe rules and regulations regarding employees and other persons entering and leaving the zone. All rules and regulations concerning the protection of the revenue shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Secretary may at any time order the exclusion from the zone of any goods or process of treatment that in his judgment is detrimental to the public interest, health, or safety.

No retail trade shall be conducted within the zone except under permits issued by the grantee and approved by the Secretary. Such permittees shall sell no goods except such as are brought into the zone from customs territory.

SEC. 16. The form and manner of keeping the accounts of each zone shall be prescribed by the Secretary.

Each grantee shall make to the Secretary annually, and at such other times as he may prescribe, reports containing a full statement of all the operations, receipts, and expenditures, and such other information as the Secretary may require.

The Secretary shall make a report to Congress on the first day of each regular session containing a summary of the operation and fiscal condition of each zone and transmit therewith copies of the annual report of each grantee.

SEC. 17. The grant shall not be sold, conveyed, transferred, set over, or assigned.

SEC. 18. In the event of repeated willful violations of any of the provisions of this act by the grantee, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury, or a majority of them, may revoke the grant after 4 months' notice to the grantee and affording it an opportunity to be heard. The testimony taken before the Secretaries shall be reduced to writing and filed in the records of the Department of Commerce together with the decision reached thereon.

In the conduct of any proceeding under this section for the revocation of a grant the Secretaries may compel the attendance of witnesses and the giving of testimony and the production of documentary evidence, and for such purpose may invoke the aid of the district courts of the United States.

An order under the provisions of this section revoking the grant issued by the Secretaries shall be final and conclusive, unless within 90 days after its service the grantee appeals to the circuit court of appeals for the circuit in which the zone is located by filing with the clerk of said court a written petition praying that the order of the Secretaries be set aside. The clerk of the court in which such a petition is filed shall immediately cause a copy thereof to be delivered to each of the Secretaries and they shall forthwith prepare, certify, and file in the court a full and accurate transcript of the record in the proceedings held before them under this section, the charges, the evidence, and the order revoking the grant. The testimony and evidence taken or submitted before the Secretaries, duly certified and filed as a part of the record, shall be considered by the court as the evidence in the case.

On such appeal the court shall review the record of proceedings before the Secretaries and, if a decision of said Secretaries shall be supported by evidence, shall only make decision on errors of law.

SEC. 19. In case of a violation of this act, or any regulation of the Secretary under this act, by the grantee, any officer, agent, or employee thereof responsible for or permitting any such violation shall be subject to a fine of not more than $1,000. Each day during which a violation continues shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 20. If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to certain circumstances be held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provisions to circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 21. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendment, ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RECIPROCAL-TARIFF AGREEMENTS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 8687) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I presume that refers to the amendment on page 1, line 8?

Mr. HARRISON. Let me say to the Senator from Oregon, with his permission, that the first amendments, as we all know, are merely clarifying amendments.

Mr. MCNARY. I observe the same language was used in line 11, but has been transposed to line 8. I assume that is to clarify the provision and make it more effective. Is that correct?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is alluding to the pending amendment?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; the amendment on page 1, line 8, inserting the words "in the present emergency." That is a transposition of the same language found on line 11?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. And I assume it is to make it more certain and make the expression more emphatic?

Mr. HARRISON. That is very true, so that if the question shall be tested in the courts the law itself will show it is enacted "in the present emergency." I may say that the committee was unanimous in adopting these amendments.

Mr. McNARY. I do not suppose the Senator means that all the amendments were unanimously agreed to in the committee?

Mr. HARRISON. I mean the clarifying amendments.

Mr. McNARY. Of course, we might disagree as to what is a "clarifying amendment", but I can see the force of the language and the transposition that has taken place. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 11, after the word "public", it is proposed to strike out "in the present emergency."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 10, after the word "finds", to insert "as a fact."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 11, after the word "restrictions", to insert "of the United States or any foreign country."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, at the beginning of line 14, to strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 15, after the word "the", to strike out "use of the power herein conferred" and insert "means hereinafter specified."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi explain that change?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will note that in the clause reading "will be promoted by the use of the powers herein conferred" the words "use of the powers herein conferred" are stricken out and the words "means hereinafter specified" inserted. The State Department and the draftsmen thought that the language would be improved by striking out the words "use of the powers herein conferred" and substituting the language "promoted by the means hereinafter specified." It does not alter the meaning at all, but they thought it was better language.

Mr. McNARY. Who recommended that change, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. HARRISON. That was recommended by Dr. Sayre and the draftsmen, Dr. Sayre representing the State Department.

Mr. McNARY. Was there any division of opinion in the committee when that matter was considered?

Mr. HARRISON. There was none at all over that amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LEWIS. Would it be a violation of any agreement should I address the Senate on a matter before the Senate? I might occupy 5 minutes, and then later we could take up the tariff bill. I would speak with the understanding that the length of time I should occupy would be taken from my time in any final argument I might wish to make later in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is entitled to 15 minutes on any amendment and to 20 minutes on the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Assuming that I shall occupy only 5 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into each Senator may speak only once on any amendment and only once on the bill. Whether it is 1 minute or 15 minutes, it must be considered a speech on the amendment or on the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator may speak on the amendment which is now pending.

Mr. LEWIS. I did not know I was interrupting the consideration of an amendment pending. I beg the pardon of the Senate. I shall not intrude at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 3, line 6, after the word "indirectly", to strike out "except that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the granting of exclusive preferential treatment to articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Republic of Cuba."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] will appreciate that the language stricken out is covered by paragraph (b) at the bottom of page 3, in the form of a new amendment. The change was made at the instance of the State Department only to make it more explicit and to clarify the situation. There is no real difference in the meaning of the two.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I was about to propound the inquiry if paragraph (b), at the bottom of page 3, is inserted in lieu of the language in lines 6, 7, 8, and 9, on the same page, to be stricken out, as just read by the clerk.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true, and it was approved unanimously by the committee.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Mississippi if there is any conflict between subsection (b) and the preceding amendment reported by the committee?

Mr. HARRISON. There is no conflict. It was to make explicit and specific that there could be no greater reduction than 50 percent under a commercial agreement with Cuba.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer to the language proposed to be stricken out, but I do not know whether it applies as an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. It would. The Senator has an amendment which he is going to offer to a part of the language proposed to be stricken out. It would come in this provision. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Florida shall lose no right by virtue of the adoption of the amendment and that he may offer his amendment at a later time.

Mr. FLETCHER. The purpose of my amendment is to enable arrangements to be made not only with reference to the duties as provided in the tariff act and fixed by the Congress but with reference to the free list as well.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that we were very doubtful of the constitutionality of the proposal and we did not go into that matter because we did not want to disrupt the bill or destroy the legislation by some interpretation of law involving taking an item from the free list and putting it upon the dutiable list.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then I shall make no objection to agreeing to the committee amendment at this time, provided I am not prohibited from offering my amendment later.

Mr. HARRISON. There will be no objection, I am sure, when that time comes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Mississippi that the Senator from Florida be permitted to offer his amendment later is granted.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the nature of the agreement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Florida may be permitted later to offer an amendment to certain language which is now being stricken out. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 18, to insert the following new subsection:

(b) Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the application, with respect to rates of duty established under this section pursuant to agreements with countries other than Cuba, of the provisions of the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on December 11, 1902, or to preclude giving effect to an exclusive agreement with Cuba concluded under this section, modifying the existing preferential customs treatment of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of Cuba: Provided, That the duties payable on such an article shall in no case be increased or decreased by more than 50 percent of the duties now payable thereon.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, not being very familiar with the parliamentary status, I understand I would have a right to reserve the offering of amendments to committee amendments until a later time. If we adopt the committee amendment at this time, does that preclude our later proposing to amend it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Louisiana that an amendment to a committee amendment should be offered when the committee amendment is pending, unless unanimous consent be granted that it may be offered later.

Mr. HARRISON. I shall offer no objection to individual amendments being offered later.

Mr. LONG. May we have that understood by unanimous consent?

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator has an amendment he desires to offer, he may do so later.

Mr. LONG. Some of the amendments of other Senators may somewhat transgress that rule; for instance, if the ruling be very strictly applied on amendments relating to agricultural products.

Mr. HARRISON. There will be no objection to agricultural amendments being offered at the proper time. I do not think the Senator will have any cause for complaint on that score.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. My understanding of the parliamentary situation is that it would not be appropriate to offer agricultural amendments at the present time, but only when action shall have been taken on the committee amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. I have asked unanimous consent, and it was agreed to, that committee amendments should be disposed of first. Of course, if there is an amendment to be offered to a committee amendment, it ought to be offered, under the regular practice, at the time the committee amendment is being considered. However, I am going to raise no question about that and I do not think the question will be raised by anyone else, so that each Senator may have a chance to offer his amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not want any misunderstanding in respect to it, because I think possibly the Senator from Louisiana had some misapprehension about it. For instance, the agricultural amendment, which would comprise another section of the bill, is an amendment appropriate to be offered at the conclusion of the consideration of the committee amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment that is presented or that will be presented soon by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the amendment of the committee is quite in order and will be heard with the committee amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 20, to strike out:

The third paragraph of section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall not apply to any agreement concluded pursuant to this act within any country which does not grant exclusive preferential duty to the United States with respect to flour.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The third paragraph of section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930 shall apply to any agreement concluded pursuant to this act to the extent only that such agreement assures to the United States a rate of duty on wheat flour produced in the United States which is preferential in respect to the lowest rate of duty imposed by the country with which such agreement has been concluded on like flour produced in any other country; and upon the withdrawal of wheat flour from bonded manufacturing warehouses for exportation to the country with which such agreement has been concluded, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the imported wheat used, a duty equal to the amount of such assured preference.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there are in the Senate many representatives of the wheat-growing States. Flour being a byproduct of wheat is likewise of interest to them. Because of their absence I am going to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say, before the Senator does that, that the language is proposed to be striken out of the bill at the suggestion of the State Department. The language which is proposed to be inserted is language suggested by the southwestern wheat growers and milling interests. It is peculiarly strange, but the interests at Buffalo and in the Southwest got together upon this language, and that is why we propose to insert it. We have not had a single protest against it. Everyone with whom I have talked and who has investigated was very well satisfied. It is intended to protect the people in the Southwest in the matter of preferential treatment.

Mr. McNARY. There are other sections of the country devoted to the production of wheat, and I want Senators from those sections of the country to be present while the amendment is being considered.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to that, of course. If the Senator would permit the amendment to be agreed to and then there should arise any question about it, I should be perfectly willing to have the vote by which the amendment was agreed to reconsidered.

Mr. McNARY. I adhere to my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Hebert	Pope
Ashurst	Couzens	Johnson	Reynolds
Austin	Cutting	Keyes	Robinson, Ark.
Bachman	Dickinson	King	Russell
Bankhead	Dieterich	La Follette	Schall
Barbour	Dill	Lewis	Sheppard
Barkley	Duffy	Logan	Shipstead
Black	Erickson	Long	Smith
Bone	Fess	McCarran	Steiwer
Borah	Fletcher	McGill	Stephens
Brown	Frazier	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Bulkley	George	McNary	Thompson
Bulow	Glass	Metcalf	Townsend
Byrd	Goldsborough	Murphy	Tydings
Byrnes	Gore	Neely	Vandenberg
Capper	Hale	Norbeck	Van Nuys
Caraway	Harrison	Norris	Wagner
Carey	Hastings	Nye	Walcott
Clark	Hatch	O'Mahoney	Walsh
Connally	Hatfield	Patterson	White
Copeland	Hayden	Pittman

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to reannounce the absence of Senators announced on previous roll calls, again relating the reasons for those absences, and ask that they stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggested the absence of a quorum on account of the somewhat confusing language employed in the attempt to amend that part of paragraph 3 of section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930 relating to bonded manufacturing warehouses. That act reads:

No flour, manufactured in a bonded manufacturing warehouse from wheat imported after 90 days after the date of the enactment of this act, shall be withdrawn from such warehouse for exportation without payment of a duty on such imported wheat equal to any reduction in duty which by treaty will apply in respect of such flour in the country to which it is to be exported.

I think I know what that means. When I read this amendment I note that it provides—

The third paragraph of section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930—

Which I read just a moment ago—shall apply to any agreement concluded pursuant to this act to the extent only—

And then follows certain language. It is a partial modification of the existing third paragraph of section 311. I should like to have the impressions of some of those who represent wheat-growing States as to whether that is satisfactory. I am not clear about the amendment and what effect it has in its modification of existing statutes.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that the statute referred to, section 311 of the act of 1930, was the one, he will recall, in connection with which there was quite a fight between the southwestern millers and the Buffalo millers with respect to wheat brought into the United States in bond and afterward shipped into Cuba, getting the preferential treatment because of the commercial treaty with Cuba. This amendment does not disturb that status quo, because in the case of wheat brought from Canada, say, into Buffalo, and flour made from it and shipped into Cuba, because of the 20-percent differential, the difference between whatever is collected by virtue of that differential and the ordinary tax is paid into the Treasury of the United States, in order to put them all upon a parity. That is what the southwestern millers wanted. They did not want the proximity to Canada of the Buffalo millers to give them an advantage in getting wheat and milling it into flour and shipping it to Cuba.

Consequently, section 311 was written, in order to put the two upon a parity.

In negotiating trade agreements we did not want that status quo affected, because we did not think it was fair to affect it; and that is why this language is used. After conference between the millers representing the Southwest and the Buffalo millers they have agreed on this language.

Mr. McNARY. I understand that; but, as the Senator presents the subject matter to me, it appears that this is a sectional agreement. The converters in Buffalo, the northeastern part of the country, and the wheat growers in the southwestern part of the country have agreed; but between those two points are the wheat fields of America. I desire to know if this agreement is acceptable to those who grow wheat and convert wheat in the great Mississippi Valley, the great northwestern section, and the territory tributary to the Ohio River.

Mr. HARRISON. So far as the Finance Committee is concerned, not a single protest has been received by us, and I am informed that that is true with reference to the State Department, as to the language incorporated in the bill as a result of the agreement. Section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930 has worked very well.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. McNARY. I do.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is it or not true that if we should leave this amendment out of the bill the President, in making the agreements which he will have authority to make under the bill, could do exactly what the amendment prescribes? In other words, without this amendment may not the President do what the amendment says must be done?

Mr. HARRISON. Unless we repeal the present law. In the House bill it is not repealed. We made an exception in certain language to section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930, which is an exception to the general law, because while it does not specifically name Cuba, it does apply only by virtue of any preferential agreement that we have. The difference in duty that there may be by virtue of that preferential agreement is to be paid into the Treasury. Cuba is the only country to which that would apply.

Mr. HASTINGS. I heard the chairman make the same explanation of this matter in the committee. I did not understand it then, and I do not understand it now—not even after the Senator's explanation—because to me it is a very difficult subject; but what I am interested in is whether or not, upon the request of somebody or some group of persons, we have undertaken, by this amendment, to protect them. That is the reason why I inquired whether the President, in making trade agreements, may not do, if he wants to, exactly what he may do if this amendment shall be agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. No; if we did not insert one of these amendments, the foreign country would get the advantage. For instance, Canada could ship its flour into Cuba, and, getting no preferential treatment, it would be very much to the disadvantage of our millers who use American wheat and ship their flour into Cuba.

I should like to read to the Senate an explanation of this matter from the report of the committee. The Senator will find this on page 20 of the report:

The third paragraph of section 311 of the Tariff Act of 1930 is made inapplicable to any agreement concluded under the present bill with any country which does not grant exclusive preferential duties to the United States with respect to flour.

This paragraph provides that no flour manufactured in a bonded warehouse from imported wheat shall be withdrawn for exportation without the payment of a duty on the imported wheat equal to any reduction in duty which by treaty will apply in respect of such flour in the country to which it is to be exported.

Of course, we, having only one treaty which gives preferential treatment, it would apply only to Cuba.

The purpose was to prevent any benefit accruing, under the exclusive reciprocity treaty between the United States and Cuba, to flour manufactured from imported wheat. That treaty was the only reciprocity arrangement with another country in force at the time when the act of 1930 was passed. The present bill contemplates reciprocity agreements with many countries, but the language is designed so that, so far as Cuba is concerned, the present situation will remain unchanged.

The new reciprocity agreements with foreign countries will not be exclusive. In other words, the other parties to those agreements will normally generalize the reductions to the United States in accordance with their most-favored-nation obligations with still other countries. The result would be that, if American millers were required to pay into the United States Treasury the amounts of the reductions of duties in the countries to which they export their flour, the generalization of such duties by the other countries would result in their competitors receiving reductions which would be denied to American manufacturers. It is desired that American manufacturers shall not be thus put at a disadvantage; and, accordingly, when the flour shipments, under the new agreements, are made to countries which do not, like Cuba, grant exclusive preferences to the United States, the provisions of the third paragraph of section 311 will not apply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, after line 18, it is proposed to strike out:

(c) The provisions of this act shall terminate 3 years from the date of its enactment.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) The authority of the President to enter into foreign-trade agreements under section 1 of this act shall terminate on the expiration of 3 years from the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am advised that there are in course of preparation some amendments touching this provision, and I ask the Senator from Mississippi to allow it to go over for the present.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks that the committee amendment be passed over. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be passed over. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, after line 3, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 4. Before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act, reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President, or to such agency as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe; and before concluding such agreement the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission, the Departments of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I offer the following amendments to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendments to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, line 8, after the word "instrumentality", it is proposed to add the following words: "and the commodities contemplated to be affected by such agreement"; and on page 6, line 10, after the word "designate", to insert the words "at a public hearing and."

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, inasmuch as these two amendments are interrelated, I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I wish to submit to the Senate the importance of adopting these proposals in the interest of fair play to American industry and agriculture and in the interest of making the proposed notice and hearing actually and in fact a free opportunity for an expression from the interested American parties involved.

Let me read the committee amendment as it would read if the amendments I have offered were agreed to. The provision for notice and hearing would then read as follows:

Before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality and the commodities contemplated to be affected by such agreement shall be given, in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President, or to such agency as the President may designate, at a public hearing and under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

And so forth.

Mr. President, great importance has been ascribed to the Senate committee amendment intending to provide for notice and hearing. It seems to be admitted that the President and his executive policy committee, which evidently is to be the body which is to pass upon these proposals, should not act in the nature of a drumhead court martial. As a matter of fact, even at a drumhead court martial the defendant has an opportunity to be heard and to be present at his own hearing.

Under the bill as originally drawn there was provided no opportunity whatsoever for the interested American industries or the interested American agricultural commodity to have the remotest chance to know what was in contemplation in respect of its destiny, or to know what might happen to it in respect to one of the proposed tariff bargains. The only thing any of them could know would be to read in the morning paper that a death warrant had been pronounced upon them. The Senate committee evidently acknowledged that this was un-American, unwise, and improper, so the committee reported the amendment which is now pending before the Senate.

I submit with great earnestness that the amendment as pending is little more than a gesture, and is not even remotely calculated to accomplish the purposes which evidently were acknowledged in its original authorship, except as it be extended in some such fashion as I have proposed.

Let me make this matter plain. As drawn, and as pending, the only notice the President has to give respecting a pending trade agreement is "his intention to negotiate an agreement with such government." In other words, the notice might say that he intends to negotiate an agreement with Spain. That simple, indefinite announcement would completely comply with the amendment as drawn and submitted by the committee.

Mr. President, I submit that that is pure camouflage and shadow boxing. What notice does it carry to any affected interest in the United States to know simply that the President contemplates an agreement with Spain? Let us take an even more specific and identified example. We know that already an agreement has been consummated with the Republic of Colombia in respect to one of these trade agreements. What was the notice given by the Department of State on December 15, 1933, respecting this trade agreement? And I take it that, since the State Department made this announcement on December 15, it may be assumed that it is typical of the kind of announcement the State Department would consider fully to comply with the text of the Senate amendment as pending. What was it that the State Department announced with respect to this trade agreement? It announced solely and simply that it had signed a reciprocal trade agreement with the Republic of Colombia.

Does it involve fruit? Does it involve oil? Does it involve coffee? Does it involve minerals? Does it involve any one of innumerable commodities which are interexchanged between Colombia and the United States?

Of what earthly practical use is a notice to the people of the United States simply that an agreement with Colombia is contemplated? If there is any good faith whatsoever in the purpose to give notice to the affected people and interests, if there is any remote idea of making the notice effective, it is perfectly obvious that the affected commodities or the commodities which are contemplated to be affected by the agreement must be noticed along with the attempt to make the agreement itself. It seems to me that that is axiomatic.

It seems to me, save as the notice is extended—I now read the language of the pending amendment which I have offered—to include notice respecting "the commodities contemplated to be affected by such agreement", that the notice amounts literally to nothing, and this proposal to give notice becomes nothing more or less than an imposition upon the good faith of the American people.

That, Mr. President, is not the only thing. It seems to be perfectly obvious that, if the notice and the subsequent hearing are to proceed in the normal American fashion, the hearing should be public. If it is not public, we have reverted to secret diplomacy, we have reverted to secret covenants secretly arrived at. We have reverted to a system of negotiations and relationship which is not only outmoded but which is repudiated by all modern thinking. Under the terms of the Senate committee amendment as pending, the hearing can be behind closed doors. It can be a secret negotiation and nothing else. There will be no adequate information given to the American people respecting vital concerns involving their lives and their livelihood. Again, it seems to me utterly elementary that the hearings should be public.

Mr. President, we are put upon notice by a decision of the Supreme Court that it is very important in respect to these hearings to be somewhat specific in our language if we intend the hearings to be anything other than an idle gesture.

I shall quote from the case of the Norwegian Products Co., petitioners, against United States of America, decided on February 6, 1933, in the Supreme Court (288 U.S. 294). I may say that this case turns on the question of what kind of hearings are required under the language of the flexible-tariff section of the law requiring reasonable hearing. The court specifically says:

There are times when the obscurity of one section as contrasted to the clearness of another may be ascribed to inattention. The need is not perceived of filling up the outlines because what is within them is assumed or carelessly overlooked.

Now, then comes this important statement:

Not so in this case, where Congress had its attention sharply directed to the fact that plain speech was needed if a hearing was to mean so much.

I submit that plain speaking is necessary if the Senate intends to do what the Senate amendment pretends to do. I submit that if we mean what we say when we propose in the Senate amendment to permit American industry and agriculture to have their day in court before they shall be sacrificed to one of these tariff bargains, then we must be willing to speak in plain language upon the subject, and we certainly should not balk, first, at requiring reasonable notice, that being the first section of my amendment; secondly, we should not balk at requiring the notice to include an indication of the commodities to be affected by the agreement, that being the second section of my pending amendment; and, third, that the hearing of interested parties shall be in public and not behind closed doors, that being the third section of my pending amendment.

Mr. President, I can scarecly conceive that the committee would object to these amendments. I shall be surprised if the Senator from Mississippi does not indicate his willingness, so far as he can, to accept these amendments, because it seems to me that any refusal to extend these definitions through the addition of these simple words must confess that the committee amendment has been proposed to the bill purely for the purpose of temporarily assuaging criticism and temporarily lulling the American people into a false sense of security.

I submit the amendments and I earnestly hope they may be approved.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, as to the first amendment embodied in the Senator's amendments, which is to insert the word "reasonable" before "public notice", I see no objection to it, and shall not oppose the adoption of such an amendment, disconnected from the remainder of the amendments of the Senator from Michigan, because I imagine that any public notice would be reasonable. I have no objection in the world to "reasonable" being written in the language of the bill.

The question as to having public hearings, however, was one which was discussed in the committee, and if we are to undertake to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements with other countries, and if we must have public hearings and give notice to the opposition country of everything that may be said about a proposition in a public hearing, it would, in my opinion, almost destroy the effect of this proposed legislation. I hope very much that the amendment, so far as public hearings is concerned, shall be voted down.

We went just as far as we thought it was possible to go in writing this language. The bill, when it came from the House, had nothing in it about hearings of any kind. As the Senator will recall, there was a good deal of criticism leveled at the bill as it came from the House, because of the failure to mention anything about hearings. So we consulted with the administration concerning the Senate committee amendment. There was no objection raised to it, and in the committee it was unanimously agreed to.

Everyone who is interested in a proposed agreement will be heard; and reasonable public notice can and will be given. It seems to me that we have gone just as far as we ought to go.

The Senator knows that if public notice were given that we were about to begin to negotiate a trade agreement with Cuba, say, those who were interested and wanted to be heard one way or the other and to present their views, would know what products there are in Cuba about which to negotiate. The same thing is true of almost every other country. If we are obliged to give public notice and cite the commodities concerning which negotiations are to be had, and one is left out, then when conversations are had with the representatives of the foreign country we must begin all over again and give another notice, and include another commodity, and so on.

What we are trying to do is to cope with foreign countries that are making reciprocal trade agreements overnight and building up their export trade. If we shackle and put so many restrictions around the representatives we are delegating to try to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements for the advantage of the American farmer and American industry, then we cannot get anywhere. And certainly if public hearings must be had and then if, as the question arises in conversation, every commodity must be published, the negotiations will be greatly delayed, as well as the final agreements.

I am perfectly willing, if the Senate desires, to accept the word "reasonable", but I hope the amendments, so far as public hearings are concerned, and as to the naming of the commodities, will be voted down. Even section 336, the flexible provision of the present tariff law, which gives the President broad powers, does not provide for public hearings but merely for "hearings."

The Senator must display some confidence in the gentlemen who are directing the affairs of the Government. I appreciate the fact that it is a great and grave and important function which they are to perform, but if the measure is to be a success, we must not restrict them too greatly by enabling other countries to know exactly what we are to bargain about, and thereby give them all the advantages. We will be trying to enter into trades to the advantage of the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have had sent to me a copy of a letter which the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] sent out respecting wool, in which he said:

> I want to call your attention particularly to the letter which Secretary of State Hull wrote giving me positive assurance that no action would be taken with respect to any commodity until, first, negotiations had been held with foreign countries, and, second, until public hearings had been held to permit all persons affected to make their views known.

That would indicate that the Secretary of State is not opposed to public hearings.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, the Senator ought to have some faith in the Secretary of State; he ought to have some faith in the President. We say here that the rules and regulations shall be prescribed by the President of the United States, and I cannot assume that the President is going to act disadvantageously to the United States and against the interests of the United States. It seems to me, Mr. President, it is the wise course and the safe course in a matter such as this to leave the rules and regulations to be prescribed with reference to the hearings, with reference to the notice, and so forth, in the hands of the President of the United States, since we are delegating to him this power.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, it is pleasing to note that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] has conceded that the word "reasonable" should be written in in line 6. The reason that word should be written in is because what is reasonable with reference to one commodity might not be reasonable with reference to another commodity. I do not see how any concern is going to be permitted to know how its interests will be affected unless it knows what commodity is involved in the negotiations.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Can the Senator imagine what a notice that we were about to negotiate with the British Empire might convey to the American people in respect to identified commodities? If such a negotiation would not cover the entire tariff list, I do not know what would.

Mr. DICKINSON. I would have no conception of the commodity concerning which negotiations were to be undertaken. In addition to that, let us take, for example, a negotiation with Mexico. It might probably include livestock on the hoof or onions or vegetables produced across the Rio Grande River. How in the world could the beef producers in the Northwest know whether or not their interests were involved unless there was some notice given that negotiations were to be undertaken with reference to tariff rates affecting the importation of cattle on the hoof? The same thing would be true with reference to Brazil. An agreement with Brazil might provide for additional importations of coffee, but, on the other hand, it might provide for the importation of canned meat from the packing concerns of South America which might be allowed to come in here at a lower tariff rate than is now scheduled. How would the beet producers of the Northwest know whether or not their interests were going to be affected?

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. DIETRICH. Would not the President, in sending notice that a certain treaty was about to be consummated, take into consideration what provisions such treaty contained and would he not give those persons who were interested in a given commodity notice that it might be dealt with in the treaty? Could he give anybody else any notice?

Mr. DICKINSON. That is just what we want him to say, namely, as to what commodities negotiations are going to be entered into.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. There is nothing in the world in the provision that has been recommended by the Finance Committee now before the Senate that prohibits the President or restrains the President, if he so desires, from giving notice of the particular commodities. We merely say, "Give him a free rein under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. DICKINSON. But the reply to the Senator from Mississippi is that we want to know whether or not negotiations are being carried on concerning our commodities.

Mr. HARRISON. And the reply of the Senator from Mississippi to the Senator from Iowa is that, no matter what we may put in the bill, the Senator from Iowa will not vote for this proposal.

Mr. DICKINSON. If the Senator is going to take that attitude, let us consider his position on the tariff.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator, if this amendment were adopted, would he vote for the proposal?

Mr. DICKINSON. No; I do not want to vote for it at all.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course the Senator would not vote for it.

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not believe in this sort of thing.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course not.

Mr. DICKINSON. But if we are going to have it—and the Democrats have the votes to adopt it—I should like to see the bill written in such form so that it will protect, so far as we can afford protection, the interests that are going to be crucified.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will yield further, of course, I accept that as his version, but there are some who would like to destroy the effectiveness of the measure so that it will be a failure. Of course, I do not put the Senator from Iowa in that category. He wants to see it made a success, even though he is going to vote against it.

Mr. DICKINSON. No; I am not for the delegation of power contained in this bill at all, and I will give a few reasons for my opposition before I conclude. In view of the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, I want to read from the New York Times of April 26, 1930:

> Senator PAT HARRISON, Democrat, of Mississippi, in an address last night at the seventeenth annual dinner of the Association of Stock Exchange Firms at the Hotel Astor, declared that acceptance by Congress of the Senate coalition's flexible-tariff provision was necessary for final approval of the tariff bill. He warned that defeat of the Senate amendment was likely to result in defeat of tariff legislation at the present session of Congress.

Then I quote from the Senator:

> There is no item on which the two Houses disagree that will consume more time and call for a higher degree of statesmanship than the flexible provision. The Executive contends for the present law; the Senate battle for a change. It is a contest so important in character and so grounded in principle that defeat of the Senate amendment is likely to spell defeat for tariff legislation at the present session of Congress.

The Senate amendment provided that whatever was negotiated had to come back for approval by the Senate. I quote further:

> I never want to see another tariff bill written in the manner and under the influences that operated in the formulation of the pending one. The serpent of selfishness hisses through every item and its slimy stains smear every paragraph. Tariff rates should be written through expert counsel after an impartial investigation.

I should like to know how we can have an impartial investigation unless the people who are interested are given the right to present their side of the case. That is all we are pleading for in the amendments offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

In reference to secrecy and the suggestion that it is necessary that all these matters be kept under cover, let me say that we have too much secrecy all along the line in everything. I am going to show something about secrecy in one of the departments, not in a matter which affects the tariff bill but one which does affect some of the things that are being done in various executive departments of this Government. I read from a letter signed by Harold L. Ickes, under date of April 30, 1934, in which he says:

> It was anticipated that there would be resistance to any plan designed to increase the protective features of the Indian policy and at the same time to decrease Federal overlordship; but it was not expected that employees of the Indian Service would deliberately attempt to obstruct the program that has been developed by those carrying the administrative responsibility. I fully appreciate the faithful service of the great majority of the employees, across many years, and their loyalty to the new program. Unfortunately, however, I have increasing evidence that there is a subtle, misleading propaganda against the new Indian program emanating from a minority of employees within the Indian Service. Their action can only be characterized as disloyal and pernicious.
> My purpose in addressing you is to notify all of those engaged in this scheme to defeat our program that a continuance will be under penalty of dismissal from the Service. It is not intended to deny to any employee the freedom of expression or the right to petition Congress, but these privileges do not carry with them the right to interfere with administration by undercover methods. There is a point at which such interference can be defined as insubordination to the detriment of the Service.
>
> If any employee wishes to oppose the new policy he should do so honestly and openly from outside of the Service. This would mean his resignation. Any other course is unscrupulous and is detrimental to the Indians, because it acts on the Service like a canker.

That shows what secrecy does. Employees shall not be permitted to express themselves on a matter of public concern.

Now, I want to go a little further. We have an executive policy committee that is going to be an advisory committee to the President in connection with all matters under the pending bill, if it shall become a law. I referred to that committee the other day. The Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Sayre, who is now honoring us with his presence, is on that committee. Two other members on that committee represent the A.A.A., and I presume are to advise with reference to agricultural matters. What I have in mind is, if we do not provide for public hearings, how are we going to know that anyone who is familiar with agriculture and the problems of agriculture is going to participate in the negotiations? That is a phase of this matter in which I am intensely interested.

The first man representing the A.A.A. is Dr. H. R. Tolley. He was born in Indiana, and, so far as can be found out, never engaged in farming. He attended Indiana University and specialized in agricultural statistics. He has been in the Government service 15 or 20 years, coming to Washington as statistician in agricultural engineering in the Department of Agriculture. Later he was made head of the Division of Farm Management in the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. Subsequently he was made Assistant Chief of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics in charge of research. About 1930 he was taken to California as director of the Gianinni Foundation to conduct all kinds of agricultural research, particularly for the benefit of California farmers. In 1933 he was brought back to Washington by the A.A.A. to head up the special crops section. Now, he is assistant to Administrator Davis and in charge of the long-time planning policy. I suggest there is nothing there to show that this principal adviser, so far as the farmer is concerned, has had any intimate contact with farm problems from actual experience.

The next man is L. R. Edminster, who was born in Illinois about 1893. So far as can be found, he has had no actual farming experience; if any, it was while he was very young. He received his A.B. at Harvard in 1916. In 1917 he taught at Lake Forest Academy in Illinois. In 1918 he taught in Kansas State Normal College.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Surely the Senator is not contending for such a ridiculous proposition, is he, as that a man appointed to regulate agriculture should know anything about farming?

Mr. DICKINSON. I understand that the best Secretary of the Treasury that could be found would be a man who was a good farmer. I do not know whether a man, because he has been a good economist or statistician, would make a good adviser so far as agriculture is concerned.

Mr. LONG. The Senator, I hope, is not trying to have it understood that in order to be an adviser to the Agricultural Department a man should know anything about farming and farm products?

Mr. DICKINSON. Not under the present administration.

Mr. LONG. We would be depopulating the Department of Agriculture, if the Senator should succeed in the enforcement of that policy.

Mr. DICKINSON. I might suggest that if we are going to have tariff adjustments which are going to affect the farming interests of the country, there ought to be a public hearing; there ought to be reasonable notice; the commodities involved ought to be named, and there ought to be permitted an opportunity to present the side of the case which will protect the producers of the raw products in this country.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator is innocently making a very good excuse for the lack of public hearings. The whole truth about the matter is that if public hearings should be held there would be opposition and there would be no trade agreement. That is what it is desired to get away from. The Department does not want any voice raised in opposition, because that would defeat the principal purpose of the bill. It is desired that the negotiations shall be conducted in secrecy.

Mr. DICKINSON. That shows why the whole scheme is impractical and impossible and should never be attempted. It is just as impractical and impossible as the N.R.A.

Mr. FESS. That is the whole truth about the matter, and that is the frank confession which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] made when he stated a while ago that we could not do this except in secret.

Mr. DICKINSON. If we have to do it in secret, I would prefer not to do it at all.

I continue about Mr. Edminster. He is the man who is going to be on the policy committee to determine what is going to be done, and he is going to be there representing agriculture. From 1919 to 1926 he was economist with the Tariff Commission. From 1926 to 1928 he taught at the University of Virginia. From 1928 to 1930 he was with the Brookings Institute at Washington in connection with tariff studies, principally with regard to cattle and wheat. About 1930 Secretary Hyde brought him over to the Bureau of Agricultural Economics as head of the foreign section to work on foreign trade and tariff problems. His principal report is entitled "Tariff Barriers." Recently he has been tansferred or promoted to be head of the export-import section of the A.A.A., and more recently was made a member of the President's new executive policy committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Iowa on the amendment has expired.

Mr. DICKINSON. I will take some time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized on the bill.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have another interesting comment here, which does not strictly apply to this particular item, but I wish to submit it because I think it contains much information. It is a new-deal note being circulated in Iowa. The note is in the following terms, and bankers and others familiar with the forms of notes will be greatly interested in this new form:

NEW-DEAL NOTE CIRCULATED

For value received, 2 years after date (unless (1) the time of payment be extended by law, or (2) the obligation to pay be terminated by act of legislature or by Executive order, or unless (3) at the time of maturity hereof the country or locality be suffering from economic depression, low prices for produce, drought, cyclone, fire, pestilence, or unless (4) there shall exist some kind of emergency, declared by act of the legislature, or Executive order, to be an emergency), I, we or either of us promise to pay to the order of _____ _____ dollars (unless some other form of money be made lawful either by legislative act or by Executive order, and unless (2) a different amount in dollars, or in such other medium of exchange or currency which shall or may be established by law, or Executive order, be made the equivalent of the sum herein above specified), with interest at the rate of ____ percent per annum (unless some other rate be established by law, or by Executive order, or unless interest be so abolished), payable semiannually (unless the time of payment be extended or postponed by law or by Executive order).

The maker, endorsers, and guarantors of this note, jointly and severally agree to and with the payee and his assigns, that (1) they will perform as little labor as possible, working not to exceed 30 hours per week; (2) that they will save nothing, but will, for the purpose of giving circulation to money (or whatever may be declared by law or by Executive order to be money), expend promptly all moneys coming into their hands; (3) that they and each of them for the purpose of bringing back prosperity and promoting recovery will borrow all money which shall or may become available for borrowing to them and each of them and that they and each of them will promptly destroy all produce, livestock, hay, cotton, or other crops (growing or harvested) which might contribute toward an overproduction of such article or articles as Government statistics may from time to time indicate, or as we may be requested to do by the new deal, the P.W.A., C.W.A., N.R.A., A.A.A., or any other agency which may from time to time be established by law or by Executive order. And we and each of us do jointly and severally hereby agree that if this note be placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, or if suit be brought for the collection hereof, that we and each of us, our sons, relatives, and neighbors will promptly hang or otherwise disable such attorney. It is hereby agreed that an emergency exists, and that we will not pay this note if we don't want to do so; and that we don't want to.

(This form to be used to promote recovery, provide for the circulation of money, and to do away with the old out-of-date methods of industry, honesty, and thrift, and to guard against overproduction of pigs, etc., to abolish self-reliance, and to insure the personal popularity of the new deal—especially among dead beats.)

Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Are there three proposals contained in the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct. By unanimous consent it was ordered by the Senate that the three amendments be considered en bloc.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I would be precluded under the unanimous-consent agreement from asking for a division of the question, would I not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator might ask to rescind the order that the three amendments be considered en bloc.

Mr. NORRIS. So far as I am concerned, I want to vote for the insertion of the word "reasonable" before the word "public" in line 6, page 6, but I do not want to vote for the two other proposals contained in the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] if he will not agree to let us adopt the first amendment, to which we have no objection?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall be very glad to do so. Then we can have the issue on the two supplemental items.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the first amendment of the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the committee is agreed to, being the insertion of the word "reasonable" before the word "public" on page 6, line 6.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to be heard briefly on the amendment as it is now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no criticism to make against any Senator if he is opposed to the whole bill. I think there are a great many legitimate arguments which may be made against it. If we were not in the midst of a depression and if we were not confronted with the activities of foreign governments, involving the tariff walls which have been built up by those governments, overnight very often, I would be opposed to the whole measure. I justify myself in being in favor of it because of what I believe to be the necessity.

Moreover, while I am in favor of the bill itself, I care nothing about section 4, the committee amendment which we are now seeking to amend by other amendments. As I look at the matter, it is very doubtful whether section 4 adds anything to the bill or whether it is otherwise; but if we are to have section 4, I do not think we ought to have the amendment suggested by the Senator from Michigan, because I think it circumscribes too much the power that we otherwise are placing in the hands of the President.

I can see, I think, how the President might give the notice want to narrow the matter down to a definite proposition, how the insertion, after the word "instrumentality", in line 8, of the words provided for in the Senator's amendment might seriously affect entering into a trade agreement. I realize that many people, with the best of intentions in the world, are opposed to giving the President authority to enter into trade agreements. I am not finding fault with that position; but, assuming that we are going to give the authority, we ought not to handicap the President by unnecessary amendments which will circumscribe his freedom of action when he is negotiating those agreements. I think this amendment tends to do that.

I can see, I think, how the President might give the notice and name the commodity; or, if the amendment should be agreed to, he would have to name in the notice the commodities about which he was going to negotiate. When he got into the negotiation, and was trying to trade with a representative of a foreign nation, he might find it desirable, he might find it necessary, that commodities other than those included in the notice should be taken into consideration in order to reach an agreement.

If this amendment were adopted, and such a predicament were presented, and anything should be put into the agreement that was not included in the notice, its legality would at once be questioned, and the first thing would be an action in court.

Moreover, referring to the other part of the amendment as to the desirability of public hearings, while it sounds well to talk about, ever since Congress has been framing tariff bills we have been having public hearings. If that amendment were adopted a demand could be made for public hearings that would last a year, and the object of making the agreement would be entirely nullified. If they were shut off arbitrarily there would be great consternation, and a great argument would be made that the interested parties were not given their opportunity to be heard, their day in court.

I presume we have more statistics on tariff rates and more hearings on the tariff than on any other one subject of legislation. If we are to grant this authority at all, we ought to let the President go into the deal with his hands untied. Otherwise, he will meet in the conferences representatives of nations who come there without any strings tied to their authority. He ought to go into the conferences free and untrammeled; and if we are to send our representatives into such conferences I believe it would be better to send them there with just as little red tape as possible.

If this plan shall succeed, as I hope it will, it will succeed, I believe, because we put our representatives on an equal footing with the representatives of other nations whom they must meet in these conferences.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. VANDENBERG. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	Hayden	Pope
Ashurst	Costigan	Hebert	Reynolds
Austin	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bachman	Cutting	Keyes	Russell
Bankhead	Dickinson	La Follette	Schall

Barkley	Dill	Logan	Shipstead
Black	Duffy	Long	Smith
Bone	Erickson	McGill	Steiwer
Borah	Fess	McKellar	Stephens
Brown	Fletcher	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Bulkley	George	Metcalf	Thompson
Bulow	Glass	Murphy	Townsend
Byrd	Goldsborough	Neely	Tydings
Byrnes	Gore	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Capper	Hale	Norris	Walsh
Caraway	Harrison	Nye	White
Carey	Hastings	O'Mahoney
Clark	Hatch	Patterson
Connally	Hatfield	Pittman

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to reannounce the absence of certain Senators announced by me on previous roll calls, to restate the reasons for those absences, and ask to have them all apply upon the present roll call, and the approaching vote following the roll call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, as I understand, we are voting now only on the proposition as to whether or not people are entitled to public notice of these proposed agreements. That is all that is before us, as I understand. The other point was accepted?

Mr. HARRISON. The word "reasonable" was inserted before the word "notice."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from Louisiana that the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan was agreed to by unanimous consent. Under the previous unanimous-consent agreement, the other two amendments proposed by the Senator from Michigan are to be voted on en bloc.

Mr. LONG. As I take it, the only thing we are concerned with now is whether or not those who produce a commodity that is to be affected are to have a right to know that it is to be affected by a treaty. In other words, we are now voting, for instance, that if sugar or oil or cottonseed is to be affected, the persons engaged in the particular industry shall have the right to be publicly notified that it is to be affected by a treaty.

My understanding is that that is all we have before us now. In other words, as I understand, the question at the present time is whether there shall be a public hearing on a commodity that is to be affected, or whether or not there shall be public notice, or at least some notice, of a commodity that is affected.

Of course, I am not going to vote for this bill even though this amendment shall be inserted. I do not understand how, in view of Secretary Hull's letter, we can stand in the way of letting the people know publicly.

There is a practice in my State under which everyone may consult the public pay roll, and know the public duties of every man who is employed, and we take it that the provision under which the public is allowed to get that knowledge does not hurt anyone. Certainly, if you are to have a tariff against us, we ought to know about it. This thing of saying that we may judge that it is bound to be on our products does not mean anything, because a country may produce hundreds of products on which there might be tariffs. I hope we will be given the benefit of public notice.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I called attention to this amendment in a rather lengthy speech I made some days ago with respect to the bill generally. I called attention at that time to the testimony of Secretary Hull before the committee.

Secretary Hull stated when he was before the committee that other countries had the opportunity to deal directly with a country with which they were negotiating, and that the United States would be at a great disadvantage if it did not have the same kind of an opportunity and the same power.

He called attention to the fact that when a certain tariff bill was before the House of Representatives its consideration occupied several months, and he stated generally that that showed that it was not possible to give an opportunity to everybody to be heard.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] suggested that if those persons who were interested in changing the rates were to be heard, other persons would be heard also, and that it would result in a joint debate which would take a long time. The Secretary replied to that generally that it would be necessary to have two more Commerce Buildings here to take care of the situation and that there would not be lawyers enough in Washington to look after the various interests which would want to be heard at such hearings.

I asked the Secretary at that time whether or not, from his point of view, it was not impractical to give notice to the interested parties. After a long explanation, part of which I have described, the Secretary said several times that it was impractical to give such notice.

Subsequent to that, this particular provision was submitted to the committee, and I am not certain that it was not submitted by the chairman of the committee himself. I was very much interested in observing the newspaper comments about the proposed notice. The newspaper headlines were to the effect that the administration had now agreed to the suggested amendment that notice should be given with respect to any agreements that were to be made.

A few days ago, when I was addressing the Senate, I called attention to the fact that this amendment was wholly innocuous. I should like to ask Senators who are now about to vote upon the amendment to read carefully the amendment which was approved by the committee.

I am very much inclined to agree with the Secretary of State, as I said the other day: If it be important to this country that we enter into these agreements, and that we enter into them promptly when the opportunity arrives, I doubt very much whether it would be possible or practicable to give to the interested parties any notice. The pending amendment carefully avoids provision for any notice, that is, any notice which would in any way be effective.

Bear with me a moment while I read the language:

Before any foreign-trade agreement is concluded with any foreign governments or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act—

As now amended, assuming the conference agrees to the amendments—reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views.

It is before it is concluded that the notice must be given. But it certainly must be true that when we make up our minds that we are going to try to negotiate an agreement with France, that, as the language, "public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government * * * shall be given."

Does that mean or does it not mean that we shall, before we begin to talk to France at all, give notice? If it does mean that, to whom shall we give the notice? It is a perfectly silly proposition, because, in the first place, we do not know, before we talk with France, what particular commodities will be involved, so that it is absurd to provide that we shall give notice before we begin to talk. We must, therefore, negotiate, have conversations, with France, before it is necessary to give any notice. The officials would not violate this amendment by doing it just that way. It is only before we conclude it that we must give the notice.

Who determines the kind of notice and the persons interested? The President of the United States. Who decides what opportunity is to be given to the interested parties? The President of the United States.

Then, when that opportunity is presented, it is presented to the President, "or to such agency as the President may designate." But under what rules and regulations is it to be presented? "Under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe."

So that the President may very well prescribe that, in order to comply with section 4 of the proposed act, the Secretary of State shall, before concluding an agreement with any foreign government, post a notice on his door to all persons interested that on a certain day he proposes to conclude an agreement with France under this provision, and that will be a compliance with the notice provision of the proposed law.

Oh, but it is said that he will not do that. I say he will not do it unless in the emergency—and that is the basis of this legislation—he finds it necessary to do it. If he finds it necessary, the emergency will be sufficient excuse for doing it in exactly that way.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Can the Senator tell the Senate of one instance in any Republican tariff law where a public hearing was prescribed—just one?

Mr. HASTINGS. Where a public hearing was prescribed?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; or where any provision was written into the law as liberal as the provision now under discussion.

Mr. HASTINGS. I say to the Senator in reply——

Mr. HARRISON. Give me just one instance.

Mr. HASTINGS. I say in reply that when a tariff bill is pending in the United States Senate or House of Representatives every person interested knows it, and every person interested has an opportunity to be heard. He has an opportunity to present his view to the free trader from Mississippi, if he desires, or he has an opportunity to present it to me as one who does not believe in free trade.

Mr. HARRISON. As one who is an inordinately high protectionist from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. Or he may present it to the high protectionists on this side of the Chamber. He has an opportunity to present it to the Senate committee; he has all kinds of opportunities to be heard; and therefore it is not necessary to provide for any public hearing, because a public hearing is the thing which Americans have believed from time immemorial they had through their Representatives and their Senators in the United States Congress, and that is to be denied them under the proposed law, and that is what I am complaining about.

Mr. HARRISON. Under the flexible provision, which delegates power to the Tariff Commission, and which was conceived by the Senator or his Republican friends——

Mr. HASTINGS. And which is not repudiated under the pending bill, by the way.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has repudiated it time after time when the rates were not increased but were lowered. Aside from that, however, was any public hearing then provided for?

Mr. HASTINGS. The language of the flexible provision of the tariff itself distinctly provides for such hearing; and if the Senator will provide for that kind of public hearing in the pending bill, I am certain the Senator from Michigan will so amend his amendment as to conform to it.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator let me read the provision into the RECORD?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will permit the Senator to interrupt me long enough to do so.

Mr. HARRISON. It reads:

> In the course of the investigation, the Commission shall hold hearings and give reasonable public notice thereof, and shall afford reasonable opportunity for parties interested to be present to produce evidence to be heard at such hearings.

There is nothing in the world about public hearings in that provision. I may say further to the Senator that in the Dingley law, enacted under the Senator's guidance and that of his party, which gave authority to the President——

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, no, Mr. President; that was before I was born.

Mr. HARRISON. No; that was not before the Senator was born, because that was only 37 years ago, in 1897. There was no provision in that law for notice of any kind, nor was any kind of hearing provided for. In the McKinley law—which was a Republican measure, and therefore, of course, good authority—in giving similar authority to the President, no hearing of any kind was provided for. The Senator can scan these delegated powers, and in no instance will he find provision for public hearings.

Mr. HASTINGS. I hope the Senator will not insist upon going back of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill for the Republican position with respect to the tariff.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not want to go back to it for anything.

Mr. HASTINGS. Very well. We still stand on it. May I inquire of the Senator from Mississippi, however, before he takes his seat, whether or not he is willing to accept an amendment to the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, which would provide for notice and hearing similar to the notice and hearing permitted under the flexible provision of the present tariff law? If he will, I will stop talking about it.

I suggest that amendment, to which I am sure the Senator from Michigan will agree.

Mr. HARRISON. If the amendment suggested by the Senator from Delaware should be adopted, would he vote for the bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not propose to vote for the bill under any circumstances.

Mr. HARRISON. No; of course, not. I expected as much.

Mr. HASTINGS. But knowing that the Senator from Mississippi expects to pass the bill, I should like to have it as harmless as it is possible to make it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Delaware on the amendment has expired.

The question is on the amendments of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. The yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], who is necessarily absent, and vote "nay."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who is necessarily absent, and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] is absent attending Memorial Day services at Gettysburg.

Mr. PATTERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. LOGAN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] with the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO]; and

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS].

I am informed that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] if present would vote "yea" on this question; and that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] would vote "nay."

So Mr. VANDENBERG's amendments to the committee amendment were rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment as modified by the first amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, is this the last of the committee amendments to be voted on?

Mr. HARRISON. There is one other committee amendment which was passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One committee amendment was passed over by unanimous consent.

Mr. CUTTING. Will that be voted on next?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Oregon asked that that be carried over. I shall not oppose that being done, and, as suggested by the Senator from Oregon, take up the agricultural amendment next.

Mr. McNARY. I continue in my hope and request that action be deferred on the amendment that was passed over. If that arrangement be satisfactory, the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] will offer an amendment.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, in that event, I think this would be an appropriate moment to congratulate the Finance Committee on the splendid job which they did in amending the bill as it came from the other House.

If we take these amendments and study them seriatim we shall see that a thoroughly unconstitutional bill has been turned into one which cannot possibly be attacked on any constitutional grounds. Take the first amendment in which the Senate committee transposed the words "in the present emergency" from line 11 to line 8. As the bill came from the other House the words "the present emergency" applied merely to increasing the purchasing power of the American public, but, as we have the bill now, its whole purport, from start to finish, deals with an emergency. That, of course, Mr. President, is a matter of supreme gratification to many of us.

I am sure that all Senators realize that we are living in a world in which words count vastly more than realities; and the Senate Finance Committee has taken cognizance of that fact.

If we turn to the second committee amendment, we notice a still more extraordinary and magical transformation of the bill. As the measure came from the other House it was provided that the President can act—

Whenever he finds that any existing duties or other import restrictions are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States.

We all know, Mr. President, that it is an old legislative principle that a legislative body has the right to delegate to any agent the power of acting when a certain state of facts exists. Everyone also knows, of course, that the question whether an existing duty or import restriction is unduly burdening and restricting foreign trade is a question of opinion. Any import restriction restricts foreign trade by the very nature of the fact. Now, the question is whether a particular import restriction is "unduly" restricting the foreign trade of the United States. The question of exactly when a restriction becomes an undue restriction would be determined differently by each member of a body of 96 men. Just how much restriction does there have to be in order to make it unduly burdensome? It would seem clear that that is a question of opinion and not a question which can be measured by a yardstick. So what did the Finance Committee of the Senate do? They inserted the words "as a fact"; and the clause now reads:

The President, whenever he finds as a fact that any existing duties or other import restrictions * * * are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States.

Naturally, Mr. President, we are interested in the verbal aspect of the matter. The insertion of those words "as a fact" makes it perfectly clear that it is henceforth a fact whether at any particular time a restriction is or is not unduly restrictive.

I suppose that we might legislate that the President could act when at some particular time he found that a toothache was unduly burdensome or that a brick was unduly red. If he found "as a fact" that the world was flat, we should no doubt have a right to delegate to him the authority to take over duties which had hitherto been considered legislative duties.

I think it is an important point, Mr. President, because all through the Bill of Rights in the American Constitution we can find over and over again descriptive phrases such as "unreasonable searches and seizures", "just compensation", "excessive fines", and "cruel and unusual punishments." From the action of the Finance Committee it would follow, I suppose, that we could delegate to the President power to take particular action when he found "as a fact" that a compensation of 5 cents was a "just" compensation for a valuable piece of property, or that he might be granted the authority to burn someone at the stake if he found "as a fact" that that was not a "cruel and unusual punishment." We have been under the impression hitherto that questions of that sort were determined by the courts, but here, Mr. President, with scarcely a word of comment, we insert in a fundamental piece of legislation that the President may find "as a fact" that an existing duty or import restriction is unduly burdensome and restrictive.

I think that is a very magnificent amendment. I think it was a piece of wise statesmanship on the part of the Senate Committee on Finance, and I want to congratulate them accordingly.

Mr. President, since we are acting under a limitation of debate, and I may not have another opportunity today of taking the floor, I desire to allude briefly to another matter.

I see before me the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], and I want to remind that Senator that this is Memorial Day and that a year ago he stood upon the floor of the Senate and exposed the manner in which the Executive by regulation had manipulated the provisions of a law by which we parted with legislative power.

When the Economy Act was passed, pledges were made by some of the most honored and respected Members of this body as to what Executive action would be taken and what Executive action would not be taken as a result of that legislation; and 1 year ago today the Senator from Oregon exposed the manner in which those pledges had been disregarded.

Last March, by a two-thirds majority of both Houses, it became possible for Congress to recover some part, at least, of the powers with which they parted in March of the preceding year, but it took a long, a hard, and a serious fight. Many of the veterans of the United States are lying under the soil as a result of the delay in obtaining again a power which we had voluntarily surrendered.

This is Memorial Day, on which we pay lip service, at any rate, to the Unknown Soldier, although we may persecute and torture his less fortunate survivors. I mention it merely because we are undertaking today something which in magnitude, it seems to me, exceeds the surrender which we made in March 1933. We are delegating away the taxing power, the power to regulate commerce, and the power to ratify treaties or agreements, whatever term may be applied most properly to the arrangements into which it is proposed to enter. If anyone thinks that because some Senator rises in his place and says, "If this power is granted it will not be used for some particular end", he has only to look back to recent history to see what was done within the past year under the terms of the so-called "Economy Act."

We have been told that wool is going to be excluded. We have been assured it would be absurd to apply the terms of the bill to agricultural products, when everyone of us knows that these assurances are worthless unless they are written into the legislation. I trust in spite of the vote which we have just taken that it may be possible, before the bill is finally disposed of, to embody in it some of the things which the Senate wishes to have guaranteed. I hope this bill will not be passed, but if that is inevitable, let us at least remember in the meantime that powers surrendered can be regained only by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I offer and ask to have read.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Was the previous amendment agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment, as amended, is now pending.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought we had voted on it and it was adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the Chair did not actually declare the result of the vote. The Senator from

New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], as I understood it, did not intend to interrupt the declaration of the vote by the Chair.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I have no interest in the matter at all. I thought the vote had not been taken.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest that the result of the vote already taken be declared by the Chair.

Mr. CUTTING. I do not wish to have the RECORD show I was speaking on the amendment of the Senator from California, of course. I intended to speak on the last committee amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I so understood and I think the RECORD will show, when the result of the vote is declared, that the speech of the Senator from New Mexico was made on the then pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the committee amendment, as amended, is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I now offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, at the end of the bill, to insert the following new section:

SEC. —. No foreign trade agreement shall be entered into under the provisions of this act with respect to any agricultural or horticultural product, including the commercial articles or materials made therefrom by usual first processings.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor. If the Senator from Louisiana wants me to yield for a moment, very well.

Mr. LONG. I beg the Senator's pardon. Will he yield for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. May I have the attention of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]? The amendment which has been offered by the Senator from California is almost identical with an amendment which is to be offered by the Senator from Florida. In order that we may permit the matter to come to a vote, if we have an hour on the amendments, I would ask the Senator from California if he would have any objection to me offering the amendment of the Senator from Florida as a substitute for his amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator from Florida wish his amendment offered as a substitute for mine?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to have it voted on at some time. I do not know whether this is the time to do it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well. There will be ample opportunity. Let me suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that he let the matter pass and that he take up with the Senator from Florida the question of offering his amendment, and let them agree upon the procedure which it may be desired to pursue.

Mr. LONG. Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am perfectly willing to agree to any procedure which will bring before this body any amendment it may be desired to present.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. May I have the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]? The agreement is that the amendment on page 5 goes over for the present, I understand.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the termination amendment. That can be brought up later.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bankhead	Bone	Bulow
Ashurst	Barbour	Borah	Byrd
Austin	Barkley	Brown	Byrnes
Bachman	Black	Bulkley	Capper
Caraway	Glass	Long	Robinson, Ark.
Carey	Goldsborough	McCarran	Russell

Duffy	Keyes	O'Mahoney	Tydings
Erickson	King	Patterson	Vandenberg
Fess	La Follette	Pittman	Walsh
Fletcher	Lewis	Pope	White
George	Logan	Reynolds

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, pursuing a course that I have ever pursued in this body, I do not intend to argue the constitutionality of this particular provision, but merely refer to it, and then, if I am able, to discuss somewhat the policy of the measure and from that something of the policy which is involved in the amendment I have presented.

In referring to the policy and the record that have been made in the Congress of the United States, I do not do it invidiously, nor is there any design upon my part to arouse intense feelings upon the part of those with whom I have stood in years gone by against this kind of legislation; nor is it my purpose to refer even to the consistency of the attitude of any Member of this body. I recognize, as a great statesman once said, that "consistency is the vice of fools"; and I recognize, too, that there are other apostrophes that we might deliver to consistency that would have little or no influence in this body, and little or no application to any argument upon this bill.

By way of diversion, I can recall in my early days when a new party sprang up in the State of California called the Workingmen's Party, and its election of its first representative in the senate of that State—how that representative—singularly enough called Senator Bones—used repeatedly to deliver eloquent appeals and eloquent apostrophes to any subject which arose; and on one occasion when he was twitting his fellows about their lack of consistency he rose to great heights, sir, and with his hand upraised, he said:

Oh, consistency! Thou art a jewel of the deepest dye.

[Laughter.]

So, Mr. President, I would not refer to the consistency of my brethren upon this floor. It might be, emanating from this side of the Chamber, like the pot calling the kettle black. I refer to the RECORD, sir, only because such glorious, magnificent, convincing arguments were made by Senators on the other side of this Chamber, and the excellence of those arguments commends them to us today.

Twice, sir, those who have served, as I have, for a long period of time, have had here for discussion the peculiar provisions of the tariff law; and twice, sir, we have had debates that distinguished the Senators who participated in them, and that embellished the RECORD where they are now entombed.

Twice, sir, in this body I have heard Senators upon the other side speak of the flexible provisions of the tariff. Never did I hear such eloquent, such magnificent, such glorious oratorical outbursts as I heard on those two occasions when we discussed those flexible provisions. They differ from the bill before us only in degree. They were of small consequence; this much greater and more important.

I remember when an honored Member of this body was the leader of the Democratic Party in 1922, the late Oscar Underwood. I recall how he called down upon us the anathemas that might be pronounced upon those false to their trust in supporting the nefarious scheme, that relating to a flexible tariff.

I recall how in 1929 we fought the good fight all over again, and I remember—there are many of them upon this floor today—how Senators upon the other side not only aroused my interest but shook my emotions, sir, as I heard them denounce the flexible provisions of the tariff and the tyranny of that kind of thing.

I stood, sir, with you on the other side of this Chamber in 1929 fighting the good fight. I stand today, sir, just where I stood in 1929. I declined in 1922 and in 1929 to yield to the executive branch of the Government the power that was ours in the legislative branch of the Government. I decline, sir, today, notwithstanding my admiration, my respect, and even my affection for the gentleman who occupies the White House, to do otherwise than I did in those days gone by upon the fundamental principle involved.

And, sir, that we may understand something of what was said in those days, I refer again to the RECORD. Some of it already has been referred to in this debate; but I refer to it in order that I may recall to those who fought the fight in the days gone by just why I am fighting today the fight that you and I fought in the days gone by, but which I am fighting today in some loneliness over here. I shall not read the eloquent words in 1922 or 1929 of the then Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh; but I read something of what was said by the then Democratic leader, away back in 1922, and again the perfervid eloquence of 1929, today forgotten, and forgotten in the main by the men who made the tremendous appeal in the days gone by.

I do not object to that. I do not object to a man changing his mind upon any particular matter that may come before us for legislation—not in the slightest—but, sir, there is something more than a legal aspect to this that we are doing here today, something far more important. There is a great policy that is at stake in what we are asked to do, a great policy that we ought to be able to solve for ourselves as legislators, and solve it as we were sent here to solve it by those we represent.

Legally, I repeat, I do not discuss the question. If there were presented to us as a matter of first impression the law of this case, there are not any two men here who claim to be lawyers who would disagree in the slightest minute particular. If there had been no decisions rendered by the Supreme Court in relation to the flexible provisions of the tariff, there would be a unanimity of sentiment among all who had even a rudimentary knowledge of the law upon the invalidity of the power that is sought this day to be given unto the President of the United States.

Now that the decisions that we have before us have been rendered in the Clark case and the Hampton case, the question may be doubtful. I do not pretend to say that it is of one sort or another; but no longer is our case one of first impression, and we may dismiss the constitutionality or the legality of the matter, and leave it for an ultimate and another decision of the Supreme Court probably. The big thing that yet remains, sir, is the policy involved in what we are doing.

Shall we delegate the legislative power that is ours and transfer it to the Executive department? Shall we grant the taxing power that is ours unto the Executive department? Shall we eliminate, as so many internationalists in this land desire us to eliminate, our participation in the treaty-making power?

These are three of the great questions of policy that confront us today; and these questions of policy ought to be determined by every one of us upon his oath, and as best he can, no matter what may transpire.

As was said 12 years ago and 5 years ago, it is not a matter of partisanship; and this was often reiterated in 1929 by a party that was in the minority upon this question, save for the few votes that it obtained from this side of the Chamber. It is not a partisan matter today, except so far as it may be made partisan by those who will not think otherwise in this particular Senate. It is not a partisan question, and it ought not to be a political question at all. We ought to be able to determine ourselves, for ourselves, for our people, whether we desire to delegate the powers that were committed to our care, and which, under our oaths, were the most sacred of all the powers that have been given by the people unto us.

This question of policy was determined in days gone by, determined so that there was no question about how our Democratic brethren stood, and, I may add in fairness, no question about how our Republican brethren stood, apparently, upon the other side. So I speak not from a partisan standpoint at all; but I speak as one who, with a sacred principle at stake, has at least pursued his own weary way, in his own particular fashion, on every occasion when that principle has come before our people, or come before this body.

In 1922 the then leader of the Democratic Party, Mr. Underwood, in speaking to those who were likely to vote in favor of the flexible provisions of the tariff, said:

> It is a plea of guilty to the charge of incompetency whenever the Congress of the United States passes a measure delegating its constitutional powers to the executive branch of the Government, as it proposes to do in the pending amendment.
> More than that, Mr. President, outside of the constitutional question, outside of the shameful confession that is being made by the Congress of the United States in advocating the surrender of its powers, I oppose this proposition because it is very dangerous to the people of the United States to put into the hands of the Executive—and I am not criticizing the present Chief Executive; there is no personal political allusion in what I intend to say; I will apply the remarks to all the Executives we have had in the past and to all we may have in the future—I say it is very dangerous to place this great power of taxation in the hands of any one man.

There was Democratic doctrine, enunciated by the leader of the Democratic Party. I believed in it. I believed in it 7 years subsequently, in 1929, when the question again arose. I believe in it today, and I am voting today just as I voted in the years gone by when this matter came before us, and the question of the delegation of our power was before the Senate for determination.

Mr. Underwood added:

> Of course, I know the President of the United States will not exercise this power personally.

That is what I know; that is what others know. It is useless to deny it. He will appoint some agent or agents to do it. Necessarily, he must. In the multiplicity of his duties, in the administration of powers such as are proposed to be accorded him, he must delegate the power to agents, just as Senator Underwood said in 1922:

> As I have said, of course, I know, as every other Senator knows, that the President, in his great office, with the vast amount of work which confronts him, will be unable to exercise this power himself, and that he must delegate it to somebody.

How much more do we know that fact today. Today we have a President burdened as no other man in the Presidential office ever was burdened in the history of this Nation; a man undertaking more marvelous adventures economically than were ever undertaken in the history of this land; a man devoting hour after hour, day and night, to the solution of the terrible problems which confront us. Of course, sir, he cannot tell whether he should make a trade agreement—a horse-trade agreement, as some of these gentlemen say—with some foreign country over eggs or potatoes or something of that sort. Some individual, some particular agency, some organization, must be intrusted with it first, and the President of the United States, with all the burdens he has on him, with all the crushing efforts by which he is endeavoring to bring us—and succeeding—out of a depression such as we have never experienced before, the President himself cannot do the job, and it is no reflection on him to say that, as was said in 1922 by Mr. Underwood concerning the then occupant of the White House. Mr. Underwood, the leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate, then said:

> This power in many instances cannot only be used to make but it can be used to destroy, and when you put this power in the hands of one man, what is going to be the effect not only on the burdens that the American people must bear in the future but on future elections in the United States? Are you going to organize in this way a machine that will wrest the control of elections from the American people unless it gets so great that we have a political revolution to tear it down? No, Mr. President; whenever you adopt this measure the Republican Party will plead guilty to its own incompetency to legislate, and it will put in the hands of its own Executive a power that no executive in this world should possess.

Mr. President, that was a patriotic utterance by a patriotic man, one who had the regard and the respect of all of us.

In that same session, may I call to the attention of the Senators from North Carolina, remarks were made by that grand old Roman from the State of North Carolina, Senator Overman, in regard to this power. He said:

It is indefensible and most iniquitous; and not only so, but by the adoption of this amendment it will be made absolutely revolutionary. Great Senators, representing a great people, absolutely abdicate the sacred trust reposed in them by a free people to preserve and maintain the Constitution. The power reserved by the people in section 8, article I, of the Constitution, which says that Congress shall levy all taxes and imposts, this bill proposes to delegate to one man, centralizing in the Executive the power to kill or to make alive.

* * * * * * *

I simply wanted to protest not only against this bill but against this violation of the Constitution of the United States, and in behalf of a great State, representing a great people, always jealous of their rights, desiring to preserve the Constitution and liberties of the people guaranteed to them, protest against the passage of the bill and most emphatically the adoption of this amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon its passage.

These were early statements, statements made in 1922. I will not repeat the statements made in 1929. In the RECORD have been placed all of the speeches that were made during 1929, and those who have followed the RECORD at all have found that practically every man who was a Member of the Senate in that period expressed himself in one way or another on that occasion.

More than that, so important was the subject, of such transcendent consequence was it to the people of this country, that the minority members of the Committee on Finance, with "a decent regard for the opinion of mankind", went to the people themselves and published their round robin throughout this land in order that there should be no mistake about their attitude and about what we were endeavoring to do in the Senate at that time.

I read but a little, in order that I may hurry. The joint statement by the minority members of the Senate Finance Committee said these things in 1929. And, remember, it was but a little encroachment then that was proposed with the peculiar provisions of the flexible tariff. Today the gap has been widened until, in the language of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], not only is there the little break in the dam, but the onrush is permitted to come through the destroying of the legislative power and the delegation to the Executive of that legislative power.

In 1929 the minority, with its "decent regard for the opinion of mankind", and pursuing the course which had been pursued in the days when we sought our independence in this Nation, to the world gave their views upon the unrighteous and the tyrannical effort that was being made in the Congress of the United States to give unto the Executive a power he never before had possessed and which they said he never should possess at all. Then the minority of the Finance Committee said, in this address published throughout the land:

A question of far-reaching consequences transcending considerations of party prompts us to issue a public statement in relation to the so-called "flexible provisions" of the tariff bill now pending before the Senate.

The question involved is one that, in our opinion, strikes at the very roots of constitutional government. It concerns the preservation unimpaired or the abandonment of the power of levying taxes by that branch of the Government which the forefathers agreed should alone be charged with that duty and responsibility.

Again:

Authority in the Executive to make the laws that govern the course of commerce through taxation is especially objectionable. It is an entering wedge toward the destruction of a basic principle of representative government, for which the independence of the country was attained and which was secured permanently in the Constitution.

What glorious language was this! What a patriotic fervor unquestionably lent itself to those gentlemen of high repute, who thus went to the Nation itself in denouncing the proposed usurpation of power. Again they said:

The arbitrary exercise of the taxing power, all the more dangerous if disguised and not obvious, in its basic character is tyranny.

Tyranny, said these minority members of the Finance Committee in 1929, was a flexible tariff hedged around with all sorts of restrictions so that it could do little or no harm. Tyrannical it was then, and now, when there are no restrictions, when the delegation of power is complete, when the flood dam of delegation is open so that all power which Congress has may, with this as a precedent, go forward into the Executive hands, now it is a glorious thing, out of which we are to have horse trades and Yankee bargaining, Yankee bargaining and horse trades. We are going to take the eyeteeth of those abroad by our Yankee bargaining, and we are going to have horse trades which will enable us to do all sorts of things to the countries beyond the seas.

What a naive, what a childish, what a blandlike faith that is, to imagine that we are going to do all these things to those with whom we deal and with whom we trade. But I am using the language of those who are militant in behalf of this measure outside of the Chamber in speaking of horse trading and Yankee bargaining.

Yankee bargaining! We are going to teach these people over across the sea that we will make money out of that bargaining, and that they will make none. We are going to teach them that we can out trade them, and we are going to out trade them so magnificently that our export trade is going to boom and boom and boom, and we are no longer going to have any depression of any kind or any character.

Yankee bargaining and horse trading! We are going to trade some spavined thing for some great thoroughbred, and we are going to teach these people across the sea how easy it is for us to trade that which we have for that which they have, and we get all the better of the bargain!

The arbitrary exercise—

In 1929 said the minority members of the Finance Committee—of the taxing power, all the more dangerous if disguised and not obvious, in its basic character is tyranny. Resistance to the impairment of this popular right has largely occasioned many of the wars and revolutions of the past.

I quote further:

In an age where there has been a steady tendency to rob the individual citizen of his power and influence in his Government through bureaucracy we deem it our duty to vigorously protest any further encroachments in this direction, and especially with respect to taxation.

The concluding sentence of this great Magna Carta issued by the minority members of the Finance Committee is as follows:

In the hope of arousing the people, regardless of party, to take a broad and public view of this important public question, we make this appeal.

It is signed by Furnifold N. Simmons, of North Carolina; Pat Harrison, of Mississippi; William H. King, of Utah; Walter F. George, of Georgia; David I. Walsh, of Massachusetts; Alben W. Barkley, of Kentucky; Elmer Thomas, of Oklahoma; Tom Connally, of Texas.

I congratulate the gentlemen who signed that round robin and that address to the people of this land, upon the high plane upon which it was issued, and upon their courageous patriotism in taking the stand they did.

None of them is here today, I recognize. While names be similar upon this document, none of them is in this Chamber, and none of them, of course, has been heard in this Chamber upon the particular measure that is before us today. Similarity of names simply adds to the luster of those who were here then and who presented this magnificent address to our people.

I ask that I may be permitted to put the whole of this in my remarks, and that I may be pardoned from reading it all, so that I may not be unduly occupied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The joint statement in full is as follows:

JOINT STATEMENT BY THE MINORITY MEMBERS OF THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE

A question of far-reaching consequences transcending considerations of party prompts us to issue a public statement in relation to the so-called "flexible provisions" of the tariff bill now pending before the Senate.

The question involved is one that in our opinion strikes at the very roots of constitutional government. It concerns the preservation unimpaired or the abandonment of the power of levying taxes by that branch of the Government which the forefathers agreed should alone be charged with that duty and responsibility.

Whatever argument could be advanced during the war and immediately following for delegation to a degree of the taxing power to the Executive unquestionably no longer exists. To incorporate now in the law any recognition of a right of the Executive to impose taxes without the concurrence of the legislative branch is without justification.

Authority in the Executive to make the laws that govern the course of commerce through taxation is especially objectionable. It is an entering wedge toward the destruction of a basic principle of representative government for which the independence of the country was attained and which was secured permanently in the Constitution.

There is no issue here as to the integrity of any Executive who has had or may have extended to him the exercise of this power. The issue is one of taxation by one official, be he President or monarch, in contrast to taxation by the representatives of the people elected, intrusted exclusively with the power to seize the property of the citizens through taxation. If proof be needed that the danger which the forefathers foresaw is inherent in this issue, a mere casual inquiry into the methods employed, selfish influences used, sinister schemes and contrivances brought to bear, one need but examine the record.

PROCESS HELD VIRTUALLY SECRET

The principle is: Are taxation laws and their application to be made virtually in secret, whatever may be said about a limiting rule, or are they to be enacted by the responsible representatives of the people in the Congress, where public debate is held and a public record made of each official's conduct?

The arbitrary exercise of the taxing power, all the more dangerous if disguised and not obvious, in its basic character is tyranny. Resistance to the impairment of this popular right has largely occasioned many of the wars and revolutions of the past.

An issue of this importance should not be associated with the opinions or necessities of those interests, States, or sections that directly profit by some rate schedule in the body of the tariff act. With respect to the principle here at stake any trading or log-rolling is especially unjustifiable and indefensible. Neither should we be unduly influenced by the attempt to divert attention from this momentous issue by condemnation of and emphasis upon the dilatory and unsatisfactory results of congressional procedure.

POINT TO AMENDMENTS

No one seeks to prevent or in any way to interfere with the investigations and reports of the Tariff Commission in connection with emergency tariff legislation. The point is, we emphatically insist that final action and responsibility based on Tariff Commission reports shall be taken by the Congress.

For the purpose of preventing apprehended congressional delay an amendment has been made providing for the submission of the reports to the Congress by the President, and, furthermore, an amendment will be presented strictly limiting action by the Congress to matters germane to the particular subject matter or rates recommended by the President after investigation by the Tariff Commission.

We do not hesitate to say that if this extraordinary and what we believe to be unconstitutional authority passes now from the Congress, it is questionable if there will ever again be a tariff bill originated and enacted by the Congress.

It is our solemn judgment that hereafter all taxation through the tariff and regulation of commerce thereby will be made by the Executive. It is the inherent tendency of this tariff-changing device and the apparently conscious purpose of its proponents to use it to keep the tariff out of Congress, where it is such an embarrassing business, as everybody knows, to the party that profits politically by it. So also it will be of distinct advantage to the interests that are the direct beneficiaries of the tariff.

In an age where there has been a steady tendency to rob the individual citizen of his power and influence in his Government through bureaucracy, we deem it our duty to vigorously protest any further encroachments in this direction, and especially with respect to taxation.

In the hope of arousing the people, regardless of party, to take a broad and public view of this important public question, we make this appeal.

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 71, pt. 4, pp. 4150, 4151, 71st Cong., 1st sess., Oct. 2, 1929.]

Mr. JOHNSON. And in order that there might be no mistake concerning the emergency, the senior Senator from the State of Massachusetts then said:

You say the need is to provide a means of meeting an emergency. What would you think of a proposal giving the President the authority to increase the Army or the Navy upon investigation and advice by boards of Army or Navy officers whenever he deemed an emergency existed? If increase of power and responsibility in the field of taxation when emergencies exist can safely and advantageously be lodged in the President, why not let him be the judge of the extent of preparations that are necessary to provide for public defense without the concurrence of the Congress? Why stop at the mere protection of safeguarding of property? Is not the protection of life and the defense of the country of greater moment?

And then in a burst of eloquence in the closing sentence, he stated:

Senators, pause, I plead with you, before you vote for such a destructive interference with the liberties and rights of our people.

I wish that I had his eloquence, and I wish that I had his facility of expression. I wish the appeal could be made by me such as he made in those days; and I would say to the Senate: "Senators, pause, I plead with you, before you vote for such a destructive interference with the liberties and rights of our people."

And, sir, we were not dependent upon the mere statements, the ebullition of eloquence that came upon the floor of the Senate during that period, for the entire Democratic press of this country was a unit, and its articles were blistering upon the power that was sought in a flexible tariff. I believed them all, and I voted that way during that period. All during that time the Democratic press of this country never faltered for a moment in its view. They were eternally right in that fight they then made, and they were eternally right in what they said upon that subject.

I read from a paper which is now deceased; I read from it in order that there may be no invidious comparisons now. I read an article from the New York World that at that time was published upon this subject. It will bear, sir, repetition.

The Democratic members of the Senate Finance Committee have taken hold of the right end of an exceedingly important public issue when they appeal for support against tariff flexibility by Presidential decision. There can be no doubt whatever that a tariff rate is a tax, and it will be difficult to dispute their argument that taxation is the business of the Legislature and not of the Executive. The proposal to have the President use the flexible provision is in fact a proposal to let the President legislate by decree. This is certainly contrary to the spirit of the Constitution even though on narrow technical grounds the validity of the present law has been sustained. In any case it is clearly an unwarranted confusion of powers.

President Hoover's desire to have this power conferred upon him arises apparently out of his belief that he could revise the tariff more efficiently than Congress can revise it. The methods of Congress are cumbersome. They have gross and obvious defects. But their defects are bound up with the working of popular government, and impatience with these defects is the usual beginning of a desire for a dictatorship. We do not for a moment suppose that Mr. Hoover has any such desire.

I pause there to say that I resent the suggestion that is made by some people here and elsewhere that there is any desire on the part of President Roosevelt to become a dictator or assume dictatorial powers. I recognize in him something else entirely, and it is apart from his personality that I argue this case today and argue it not upon the fact that we have in the White House a President in whom I have the utmost confidence and upon whom I place utmost dependence; I argue it upon the broad ground of the powers that are ours, that should remain ours, and that should not be delegated under any circumstances.

I continue to quote:

We do not for a moment suppose that Mr. Hoover has any such desire. But his state of mind is not a healthy one; the normal processes of popular government ought not lightly to be supplanted merely for the sake of efficiency. For if the President can revise the tariff more efficiently than Congress, it may be, if he is as able a President as Mr. Hoover, that he could make better laws on almost any other subject.

And that will be the argument ever for any power that is sought to be delegated to the executive branch of government, that it can act with greater alacrity, with more celerity, and that it can make better laws than can be made by the Congress itself. But after all, this is a democracy, this is a people's government, and the fact that our ways are cumbersome, and that they are even tainted with long delay, does not in the slightest degree affect the situation or the argument upon the question.

For if the President—

Said this article—

can revise the tariff more efficiently than Congress, it may be, if he is as able a President as Mr. Hoover, that he could make better laws on almost any other subject. It would nevertheless be undesirable to give him the power to make laws on any subject.

There is no more reason why the President should supplant Congress in order to revise the tariff than that he should supplant it in order to revise any other law. Self-government is self-government, and in this country, however irksome it may be at times, it has been worth the price.

And self-government is worth the price, the price that any man may pay, politically or otherwise, for standing for it; self-government is worth the price, and self-government must not be frittered away upon one specious plea or another, upon one design or another. It should be retained where originally it was deposited, and it should be by those who are its trustees maintained in all its pristine purity.

I do not and can not, sir, recite all the references that I have here concerning statements which have been made, and time will not permit that I should go forward with them all.

Mr. President, I have spoken now from the standpoint of the policy involved. I have demonstrated out of the mouths of those who are greater men than I can ever expect to be, that the policy is one which never ought to be surrendered by a Congress, and which a Congress never should permit itself to be persuaded to delegate to any other branch of the Government.

But, Mr. President, there are certain other questions involved in this proposal. I have spoken, as I think, from the standpoint of highest ideals and ideas that should actuate one in connection with the policy that should be pursued by those who represent the people. There is another side as well to this issue.

This bill, if it shall become a law and be intrusted to the President, for enforcement must be administered by those who are his agents. We know from the hearings that have been had who will administer this law. We know that it will be the Agricultural Department and the Department of State. There is no question concerning that, I take it; and so we can picture exactly, from the mental attitude of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of State, the peculiar views which they will bring to bear upon reciprocal trade agreements and tariff rates throughout this land.

For both these gentlemen, I hasten to say, I have a profound respect and regard; for their assistants I have more than that; and having that, I would not say aught in the slightest degree that could be considered criticism of either, but reading the words of both, listening to both, I think I can understand just exactly what the situation will be when the bargaining begins.

I am a Californian, sir. I was born in that State, of practically the second generation of children born in it. I have seen that State in its swaddling clothes in years gone by, and I have seen it advance, as the years have passed, to become the fifth State of the Union, possessing the fourth city in population in the United States. I walked through that fourth city in the United States at one time when its inhabitants numbered fewer than 12,000, and beyond it there was nothing but a desert. I have seen that city grow and develop until now it has attained its present eminence; and I have seen the region surrounding it abound in those luscious fruits with which we are all familiar and which have made that section of California famous. I come, sir, from the northern part of the State, where in my office on the twentieth floor of a great building I can watch the great steamers of the world go forth through the Golden Gate and, in imagination, at least, though denied me otherwise, I can go with them to mad adventure in the South Seas and upon the sands of the various islands of those storied waters. I have seen that State grow from a mere border State to its present position. I know what it requires. I have sat in this Congress during two tariff fights when I gave every ounce of energy I possessed to get for that State certain tariffs which were required in order that it might be prosperous and in order that it might meet competition from abroad.

When I made the last fight here for California products, it was south Mediterranean states that were here with serried ranks against us, through chambers of commerce in New York City, and with representatives here every day during all that long fight. I know what is required in the State of California, and I know that no man whose views are wholly internationalist in character, who believes in free trade, or in a modified free trade, can understand this State in which I was born and which I love as I love no other place on the face of the earth. I will not willingly intrust that State and its future to two gentlemen, however much I admire them and however much I trust them, whose philosophy is so different from mine and who would deny us the tariffs we need for our prosperity, aye, which we require for our very life. I decline to do that, Mr. President, with my vote, at least; and whether we are defeated or whether we are not, I shall maintain my position; and whether it is resented that I take the stand I do today or whether it is not is a matter of absolute indifference to me. I am a Californian, loving the soil and loving the State, and I will not intrust that State, with all it has become and with the future that is its, with its glorious future destiny, to those with their internationalist views who do not believe that any protection should be accorded any place on the face of the earth.

So, Mr. President, I have my reasons for my attitude aside from the great reason of policy and the constitutional question involved. Call them selfish and provincial, if you will; I do not care a "rap." I have only a little time more when I will go back to the soil of the State of California; and that State I will not intrust to gentlemen whose views are such that they will, if those views are carried into effect, injure or impede it, not wittingly but because their philosophy is a different one from that which is essential to that State's sustenance and that State's progress. So, Mr. President, say what you will about the selfish aspect of this sort of attitude, I take it in good part and I grant you that it is deserved.

I know, too, Mr. President, that today it is a terrible thing for a man to love his home, to love his city, to love his State, to love his country. It is a frightful thing today, the sin of patriotism in this land, and there are societies throughout this country now that believe that none of us should ever dare teach our children and our grandchildren to love their country, and who preach we should set some fine example and leave ourselves naked and defenseless to all the world. But, sir, I am too old to change my views in that respect, and so I am speaking not alone as a United States Senator, as I have spoken for the larger part of what I have said today, but I speak today as a Californian, and I am not ashamed to speak in behalf of the State I represent in part and which during the long, long years has been so very good and so very kind and so very loyal to me. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, what are the views of the Secretary of State who unquestionably is going to administer this bill? We have listened to him as he sat over there again and again and again, always berating any protection, any tariff, any measure that even squinted at a tariff. We know that to be so; no man can deny it; no man can gainsay it. He is opposed to all tariff rates.

What of the Secretary of Agriculture? We can read his mind in reading what he writes. He writes magnificently. I love to read him; I adore the devoutness with which he impresses everything he writes, and I get from the charm of that which he writes a real thrill. Read him and no man need doubt what his views are—nebulous, perhaps, and now and then in the circumambient atmosphere escaping us as he flits by, but, nevertheless, he is always readable, always interesting, and he always arouses our respect and our regard. But he reminds me sometimes, as I read his views, and as I try to understand them, of the topical song which we hear and have heard so much of late—

> He floats through the air with the greatest of ease,
> This daring young man on the flying trapeze.

[Laughter.]

He mentally goes through such peculiar and rapid gyrations that I cannot follow him at times, I grant that; but he is doing a great work, a monumental work, and he is entitled, I think—even though I indulge in some playfulness here—to the respect of every one of us upon this floor.

My objection to him is solely that his philosophy in relation to the protective tariff and in relation to various industries is a philosophy to which I cannot subscribe, and which, if put in operation by virtue of trade agreements, would spell ruin for a large part of our people.

I can recall once long, long ago when I was endeavoring to try a law suit, certain doctors talked of an exploratory incision into the human body. I was young and inexperienced, and there was not anything in those days of which I had a thorough understanding, of course—I have not now a very thorough understanding of many things; but when the doctors talked of an "exploratory incision" into the human body, it shocked me dreadfully; and I never could quite get over the idea that there should be such an "exploratory incision." In this instance, may I say to my friend the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], the "exploratory incision" was wholly ineffectual, for the patient died; but the "exploratory incision" into the human body is quite beyond me; and I never was able to understand it.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that such incisions are made for the purpose of peeking in.

Mr. JOHNSON. "Peeking in"; that is an "exploratory incision." I am glad to have the information.

But, Mr. President, there have come to us the new doctrine and economy of "inefficient industries." I am not quite able to comprehend exactly how far this new doctrine goes.

It does not mean much, says our friend, the Secretary of Agriculture. I do not want to misquote him—and if I do, I trust some Senator will correct me at once—but he says there are only 5,000,000 people in this country who are gainfully employed in "inefficient industries", and that there are 40,000,000 people who are consumers and who will benefit if inefficient industry shall be eliminated, and the 5,000,000 people, presumably—I say that as my conclusion—presumably shall be eliminated too.

There is something in that doctrine which is not appealing to me. There is something in the doctrine of a man who has worked all his life in a certain way and who knows but one thing—there is something in a doctrine that would send him out into the street. That I cannot fathom and I do not like. It is all well enough to say that he is engaged in an inefficient industry; and that if those inefficient industries were all destroyed, then 40,000,000 of our consumers would benefit and the benefit would be very great from the whole national standpoint.

In those inefficient and noncompetitive industries, which are recited in the testimony of Mr. O'Brien before the House committee, I find many things in which I am interested and in which the West is interested—olive oil, cheese, eggs, dates, grapes, olives, peaches, almonds, beans, peas, tomatoes, long-staple cotton, flax, sponges, and the like. I say "straw hats" for the benefit of one of my colleagues of whom I am very fond, but he is absent at the moment, so I shall not dilate upon it.

But these are noncompetitive industries which are described, in conjunction with very many others. They are industries which are inefficient, and I do not know what we are going to do with the theory of inefficient industries unless it is meant that we are going to put them out of business. If we put them out of business, then we are going to bring, it seems to me, more ruin, more depression, more unemployment, even though there may be a little advantage to the consumer in the purchase of these things.

Mr. Tugwell has said that no one industry is entitled to support by a tariff. No industry! He does not qualify his statement in the slightest degree. Mr. Wallace makes perfectly plain that he does not believe in tariffs, and certainly not where the industries are noncompetitive or inefficient.

So we have administering this law such men. Senators of the South, who fought here for the little tariffs in their particular territories, should remember just exactly what their industries are and, if they are inefficient, look out for them in the days to come.

There is another thing in this argument that ought to be and has been called to the attention of this body. I think today it was called to its attention by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] concerning wool. Wool is one of the things which, in the language of Mr. Wallace, would probably be given a "pain" by what was being done or might be done to it. But one of our brethren here, the very excellent and very able Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], I observe in the press, has made perfectly plain that he has an understanding or an agreement by which wool is not to be affected by any reciprocal trade agreement. The instant we say that wool shall not be affected by a reciprocal-trade agreement and the instant it is said, "I have an understanding or agreement in advance that wool shall not be affected", that instant the bill is condemned, and that instant I have the right to ask, as to 40 things which come from the soil, that you deal in exactly like fashion with me and with the State from which I come in relation to those articles.

What justification is there in advance to relieve wool of the possibility of a reciprocal agreement and to leave hanging over all the rest of us the threat of an agreement that may mean ruin to us in the future? What earthly excuse is there, and what justification for an agreement or understanding, either direct or expressed, implied or otherwise, by which woolmen are to be placated, and others are to be treated in quite a different fashion?

I have an Associated Press dispatch quoting the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who, I hope, will grace this body for many years in the future, in which he speaks of "all farm products", and indicates, although he does not say, that there is an agreement to the effect that they need not fear because they will not be injured by any reciprocal-trade agreement. If that is so, adopt my amendment. If that is so, what reason is there for not saying so in the bill? If wool is to be exempted, if agricultural products are to have a place of precedence under the bill, let us write it into the law, and no man will be mistaken then in the days to come. If it be so that there is any understanding of any character in relation either to wool or to agricultural products, there is no reason on earth why we ought not to say it in this bill and make it plain beyond the peradventure of a doubt.

Mr. President, I am through for the time being. I repeat what I said before. Upon constitutional grounds this power should not be accorded. Upon grounds of public policy it ought not to be granted. It makes no difference who the man is in the White House. That is not the point at all. It is a power that will return to plague us in the days to come. However, we trust the present occupant of the White House, however great may be our regard and affection for him, we ought not at this period in our career surrender the prerogatives which were accorded to us and upon which popular government rests. We must not, as my friend the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] said in 1929, make a little opening in the dam because of the great onrush of power that will be accorded subsequently to future Presidents.

I stand here a Roosevelt man. I do not hesitate to avow it upon this side of the Chamber. I am going to avow it in the fight I intend to carry on, if God permits, in the State of California this year. He does not enter into this discussion at all. I recognize in him what I have recognized in few men. I recognize in him a degree of patriotism and a desire to serve that few men have been given of God to do. Recognizing that, though, recognizing him in the fashion that I do, paying to him the full meed of praise that is his for his work in the last year and a half, paying to him the full meed of praise that he has earned by his undeviating course and his bold and gallant courage, I say I can not and I will not, as a United States Senator, standing here upon my own feet in the body which I love, which I respect, for which I would fight if necessary—I cannot under my oath yield the power that is asked in this bill, and under the providence of God I will yield it to no man in an Executive position.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if I could concede that there is in the bill proposed a situation such as stated by the able Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], I could easily fall into the fear of consequences as baleful as his exalted oratory has pictured to the Senate. I fear, however, that one of the blunders to which we are liable is the indulgence of that which from our own nature—either born of our prejudice or of our preferences—we incline to adopt because it serves the end to which at the time we are addressing ourselves.

It is asserted by the eminent Senator from California, as was charged by Senators preceding him throughout their discussion, that the measure now before the body carries two elements of invalidity:

First, that it is unconstitutional because it assumes to create a revenue, and this to be given the voice of origin and authority by the sole act of the Executive. It is asserted that this course violates what is assumed to be the spirit of the laws establishing the organization of our Government in that it forsakes and opposes the right of the House of Representatives to originate bills raising revenue.

Second, it is asserted that the measure is unconstitutional upon that other theory advanced by the able Senator from California, and eminent Senators preceding him, as declared in their voluminous addresses, that we are vesting within the President the power to create a solemn treaty between foreign nations and the United States and to execute it in his personal capacity despite the constitutional provision which exacts ratification by this body, known as the "United States Senate." It is urged that the confirmation by the Senate as an essential adjunct preliminary to the approval of the act going into effect before it can take the form of a legal compact of authority called a treaty.

Mr. President, the able Senator from California, and, I may recall, the eminent Senators preceding him, particularly the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], and the eminent Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] have in separate presentation repeated from time to time the speeches or declarations made by Senators upon this side of the Chamber in some preceding discussion where it is assumed there was an affinity or relation similar to that which now possesses the attention of the Senate; and because of the impressions created at that time, and because of the feeling that there is a parallel, it must be assumed, say they, that what transpired then, and the judgment which followed it, is essentially that which should prevail now. It is the demand for consistency as cried out by Senate orators proclaiming the premises and its conclusion.

For myself, I am not much concerned with the cry. I rather recall, with Emerson, that—

> Consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds.

But, Mr. President, these eminent Senators are influenced by what they feel was something past and the line of reasoning there adopted which they feel should obtain here. They are unconscious that they themselves are committing a vice to their own welfare and to their object by hesitating to take the original situation as required by the present hour, rather than that which affected them in a past which may be wholly unrelated to the day and cause in which we now serve.

Mr. President, the great statesman of Britain, William E. Gladstone, had occasion to confront a situation very similar to this. He refers to the debates that have transpired in the British Parliament. He is writing an article in the Nineteenth Century. Says Mr. Gladstone:

> In very many cases, where we have reached certain results by our own inquiries, the process and the evidence have been forgotten, and are no longer present to the mind at times when we are called upon to act; they are laid aside as no longer necessary; we are satisfied with the knowledge that we acquired at a former time. We now hold to the conclusion, not remembering accurately its warrant, but remembering only that we once decided that it had a warrant. In its essence this is acting upon authority. From this sort of action upon authority I believe no man of active life, however tenacious be his memory, can escape; and no man who is content to act on this kind of authority is entitled to object in principle to acting on other kinds. * * * We are bound to act on the best presumption, whether that presumption happens to rest on something done by others or on something we have done ourselves.

Most appropriate is the suggestion, sir, from this eminent, distinguished, philosophic, and statesmanlike legislation.

Mr. President, at the very outset we wish to inquire, Is there foundation of premises in what our honorable friends contend is the basis for their opposing conclusion?

Let it be recalled that the principal contest here is combating the privilege granted by the bill to the President of the United States to conclude, in behalf of the United States of America, a mere compact and an agreement, as the representative of the United States of America, with any foreign country respecting the condition and quantity of charge that may be made the basis of exchange of trade, that which is the basis of a mere exchange of commerce between our Nation of America and any foreign nation of the world.

Since that is the premise, let us pause to ask ourselves, Where does that violate the Constitution, as is contended?

The Constitution provides that where revenue is to be raised, this is to be had through measures originating in the House of Representatives as the representative of the people who are taxed; but where the object, sir, is not primarily the raising of revenue, the position taken by the honorable Senators who contend that there is violation of the Constitution does not apply, because the object of the action is not the raising of revenue, nor for the purpose of raising revenue. It is for the purpose of creating an exchange of barter in the commerce between nations—the privilege of the Chief Executive—the President—to enter upon, negotiate, and conclude as provided in the second division of the Constitution.

Eminent Senators who have made the contention of unconstitutionality here forget that the Supreme Court of the United States has removed them from any uncertainty of mind as to the exact limitation and definition of power. I ask attention to the reasoning of the Supreme Court of the United States in United States against Norton in 91 United States Reports. I read, sir, rather the quick condensation of the ruling, that I may not take too much time in these mere expressions of legal opinion. The Court says, on page 569:

> The Constitution of the United States article I, section 7, provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives."
> The construction of this limitation is practically well settled by the uniform action of Congress. According to that construction, it "has been confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the words and has not been understood to extend to bills for other purposes which incidentally create revenue."

Story, on the Constitution, making his observations as well as this, the Supreme Court of the United States, gives us amply, sir, the reasoning on which this measure in its distinction rests.

The Supreme Court of the United States later had occasion to refer to this former opinion; and in a case supporting the lower court that went up from the city of Washington, the Supreme Court of the United States in One Hundred and Sixty-seventh United States Reports, the case being known as "Bank against Nebecker", has occasion to say:

> While the primary object of all taxation is the raising of revenue for the support of the Government, and all bills for that general purpose are "bills for raising revenue" in the sense of the Constitution and, therefore, must originate in the House of Representatives, it does not necessarily follow that every bill for some other legitimate and well-defined general purpose becomes a revenue bill, in the same sense, because, as an incident to the main object, it may contain a provision for the payment of certain dues, license fees, or special taxes.

Upon this theory, sir, the circuit court of appeals, in Thirteenth Blatchford, 207, calls attention to the specific action of our Government, and holds that a provision in an act of Congress increasing the rate of postage from 1 cent to 2 cents is not unconstitutional because it grew out of an amendment offered in the United States Senate; and following that, sir, we have the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, in Nineteenth Opinions of the Attorney General, 520, saying:

> From the foundation of the Government to the present day, the Constitution has been interpreted to mean that the power vested in the President to make treaties, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate, does not exclude the right of Congress to vest in the Postmaster General power to conclude conventions with foreign governments for the cheaper, safer, and more convenient carriage of foreign mails. The existence of such a power in Congress may, perhaps, be worked out from the authority given to that body in the seventh clause of section 8, article I, of the Constitution. * * * This has always been construed to mean the power to organize and carry on the Post Office Department.

Mr. President, it is clearly seen, therefore, that there is no bill at this time presented before this body that has for its object the raising of revenue. Therefore, the contentions of able Senators that we are violating the fundamental doctrine of the Constitution in assuming to create taxes by the act of the President has no foundation as a premise, and no justification for the conclusion in any fact that is laid before this body in proposed legislation as ordained in this bill.

It is now further contended, however, that because there is a suggestion attached to the power to be vested which calls by name the compact "treaty", that we are allowing the President of the United States to execute a treaty and absolving him of the responsibility of having that treaty ratified by the Senate and for and by that assumed privilege we are violating the Constitution.

If the facts were as the able Senator from California would assume, and as other Senators preceding him have declared, well we might say that such seems an abrogation and apparently a violation of the Constitution. But what is overlooked is the truth, and what is ignored are the facts.

Mr. President, we ask what we are seeking to do here, and what is it we propose to do? Sir, it is to authorize the President of the United States, as an envoy in behalf of the people of the United States, to enter upon a trade relation between our country and other countries respecting the exchange of commerce. The fulfillment of the very mandate of the Constitution, upon the establishment of foreign commerce.

Mr. President, we have been doing this very thing continuously for 33 years. We have had the power to do it for 55 years. The eminent Senators on the other side of the Chamber have been charging loudly the great violation of the fundamental law were the President of the United States to attempt, or, under this proposed law, should execute a compact of trade in behalf of the people of the United States, authorized by their deputies called the Congress of the United States. It is declared that in such result the President is committing some great violation of the fundamental Constitution. To this I reply as I propound to the Senators on the other side this single query:

"Senators, there has been a law which gave authority to the representatives of your Government who are called 'commercial attaché' to negotiate trade reciprocal agreements. They were sent out by your State Department; lately they have been annexed to the Department of Commerce; and they have executed 75 different arrangements from time to time within the last 11 years of different forms of trade."

I ask of my eminent friends on the other side who have been opposing this measure on the ground that this measure contemplates the negotiation of a treaty which must be ratified by the Senate, where is one single instance of the demand of anyone of you during the time when these treaties were made under President Harding, under President Coolidge, under President Hoover, that they should be ratified by this honorable body? Where is one that was ever brought here for your ratification, when it was a mere trade arrangement made by the representatives of your Government in positions and offices less than the Presidency?

Since you have never exacted it before, and since you do not now point to one you have ever enforced here, what other motive can be charged to you now than that you are looking for something to enable you to cry out to the country that, because the power is sought to be vested in this present President, there is a partisan opportunity which you snatch, where you can cry the charge against your President of the United States that he is a lawless agent on the eve of violating the Constitution, inspired with the spirit of tyranny, and hoping in its devastation the complete destruction, under the guise of democracy, of the Republic of the United States.

O shameless audacity! unpardonable perfidy! I demand of you to say if this be not your purpose, what purpose have you? If you have never exacted the privilege, which you assume now, under any of the four different Presidents whom you have controlled in your name, where is your authority for demanding now for the first time that it would be a violation of the Constitution for this, your present President, to do by himself that which your four Presidents did by their appointees?

Mr. President, it will not be overlooked that our eminent friends on the opposite side who have been making these contentions seem to maintain a significant silence in the face of the record of my accusation.

Now, Mr. President, I moved to call attention to the fact that merely calling this compact a treaty does not give it any higher place than that which it takes by virtue of its natural relation. The Supreme Court of the United States removed from my honorable friends any doubt upon this question, when that Court, in the case of Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U.S. 258), had occasion to discuss the very question, and spoke of the power, and referred to the fact that the treaty is within the right of the President and within the right of the Government, saying:

The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited, except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and of that of the States. But with these exceptions it is not perceptible that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country.

Where, my eminent friends, do you get the theory upon which you base these very eloquent speeches, these concomitant phrases of English in consolidated array of impeachments? In all these you denounce your own President before the world as unworthy of trust, and as a tyrant about to usurp the power of Government, and without the authority of law to ride bestride the Constitution to its fall and to the demolishment of liberty.

I note here, in the presence of the honorable Senators who cry out execration against the members of the Tariff Commission, that when they find nothing they can lay their hand on particularly to sustain any charge they intimate against the President of the United States violating any law they suddenly seize upon a declaration or expression on the part of a gentleman who is not the appointee of the present administration, but who is Chairman of the Tariff Commission, as voiced by him in his testimony before the Finance Committee, some such expression as that wherein he said that where the President would execute or command some action respecting a tariff schedule and the figure at which it should be adjusted that such would be tantamount to an action of the Commission, because the President is himself the Executive of the theory on which the Commission must act.

Mr. President, what is the grievance? It is that the gentleman has made the remark in some hearing that he would have to yield, or would yield, when it was found that the President of the United States desired to express himself and had concluded himself on a policy to submit to the foreign nation.

I should like to call to the attention of the Senators making the charge of misfeasance and upon such denouncing this particular officer, who was the appointee of their administration, for having uttered an expression which, according to his theory—and, to use the words of the eminent Senator from Delaware—"has destroyed his usefulness", for that he claims that therefore he would yield to the President for that the President would assume to exercise the power, therefore, exercising it, he as a member of the Commission would surrender any contention of his own differing with it.

Sirs, it is this frank avowal that is aspersed as treason to duty and a violation of every morality of public probity. Yes, and you eminent Senators making this accusation seem as ignorant of the law applying to this phase as you have shown to the constitutional basis upon which you have paraded day by day before the world at large, holding up before the civilized nations of the earth your own President as unworthy of the trust of his own colleagues, and charging him, in the presence of the tyrants of earth, as being on the eve of delivering this Republic to the hands of destruction through anarchy and socialism. All this when not one of you assume the courage to justify such accusation by any act offered or by any proof tendered. Yet, unhesitatingly you would invite the masses of the people, on the streets and at the corners of your own land, to turn on their own Government to rend it to fragments on the ground that their commanding officer, their President of the United States, is upon the eve of firing the land with the burning brand of anarchy, and consuming it with incendiarism of madness, crushing it with and doing it to its death in the process of treachery.

All this based on the assumption that the President adopts the theory of service and degree of concession of the Chairman of the Tariff Commission. What has this gentleman, Mr. O'Brien, said? I am not so much disturbed as to what he has said but I am interested in calling attention to the fact that the Tariff Commission was created by a law defining its duties and powers. This definition went before the Court for test, and in the celebrated case of Norwegian Nitrogen Products Co. against The United States, the highest Court, construing the conduct of the Commission, defining the action of that body, said:

> It is he [the President], after all, who ascertains. He does not have to rely upon the evidence produced before or the recommendations made by the Commission. There is nothing in the section which prevents him from making such inquiries as he deems proper, or from ignoring everything that is done by the Commission (20 C.C.P.A. 27).

Later that eminent Court, in the case of Foster against the United States, said:

> • • • It is true, the investigation of the Tariff Commission and its conclusions and report thereon, if any, are not, under this statute, binding upon the President. He may follow them or disregard them.

In Feltex Corporation (United States impleaded) v. Dutchess Hat Works, an American manufacturer, and United States (Feltex Corporation impleaded) v. Dutchess Hat Works, an American manufacturer (T.D. 46957), the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, on February 5, 1934, rules that the report of the Tariff Commission in an investigation for the purposes of section 336 of the Tariff Act of 1930 is not binding upon the President as limiting him to the facts therein reported, but that the President has the right to base his proclamation on any facts disclosed in the Tariff Commission's investigation, whether or not specified in its report.

Senators of the opposition, what is it you gentlemen seek? From what source do you seek the law? Upon what basis do you condemn this officer who announced the law as it is given by the highest Court of the land? Yet these eminent Senators, trying to find some reason whereby they may condemn something, which may give the color of condemnation and an adverse judgment against their own country, turn to this particular officer, and would leave the impression that it is shown in the committee proceedings that he would pander to be appointed to office by announcing he was ready to surrender his views at the instance of the President, if the President's views are contrary to those of the Commission and of the constitutional mandates.

Has any one of our eminent opponents cited the law that applies? None—not one. Is it that they did not know it—or is it they did know it and rested silent that disclosure would not defeat scandal? Has anyone referred to the decisions of the highest tribunal? None. Has any of them tested the act by any decisions of the courts of the land? None.

Without making any reflection on these honorable gentlemen, I will say that they can find it easy to say it is unconstitutional. How long has this plea of "unconstitutional" been heard? How often have you taken your resort to hurling this anathema and arousing in the mind of your own countrymen a want of credit in their own institutions? How long have you continued to invest the great public mind with the feeling that there is nothing secure in the action of the Government, no relief to be hoped, but that they are to be deceived by the enactment of every law? For that they are discouraged by the assertion from the lawmakers that their very act is to be declared by the courts as an impeachment of honor and a violation of the Constitution, all to the discredit of the Nation and dishonor of its people.

Now, gentlemen of the opposition, ever croaking "unconstitutional", where have you been able to point to one decision of a court that has held any one act of legislation of this administration invalid? Where has that opinion of yours that all is unconstitutional ever been sustained by any court to which you have ever gone in any part of the land? Where is the opinion from any other court presented by anyone else that has sustained your contention of unconstitutionality?

And, sir, may I ask who are these gentlemen going up and down the country delivering their addresses wherever there is opportunity to exhibit themselves and their vanity, or to expose their conceit and display their pompous impudence, crying out "unconstitutional" concerning every act which goes to cleanse that which has so polluted this Republic, and which is put forth to relieve the people of the burdens put upon them by the authors of the cry "unconstitutional"?

Where has one of these gentlemen—and I allude to eminent gentlemen who are reputed by the papers to come from the House of Representatives—ever presented a cause before a court contending that a law was unconstitutional and have it sustained according to his opinion? Where is any judgment that discloses that any opinion of theirs or view of theirs has ever been accepted by any court of the land? And that other band of squeaking, shrieking "captains" of dismal desolation whom no discriminating public has ever trusted with an honor or honored with a trust, who go up and down the Nation crying "dishonor" on every act of the President and his aids—these sickening every sense of justice—who in truth are they?

Yet, it is such as these who are allowed to go before the country, up and down in the highways and little paths, screaming to the full extent of their screeches of the invalidity of every act that is attempted to be passed in behalf of the people, and crying "unconstitutionality" of every measure which is tendered here for the salvation of the Nation and the restoration of the Republic which by their infamy in public place they brought to revolution and disaster.

There is my eminent friend from Delaware, the distinguished Senator [Mr. HASTINGS] who spent his time in a very elaborate address of several hours from day to day to demonstrate how "unconstitutional" is the pending measure. Yet the only decision presented anywhere, any time, by these opponents to sustain the argument is the one of the Supreme Court of the United States, which held the proceeding they were assailing wholly constitutional—the renowned case of Field v. Clark (143 U.S. Repts.) I have never been able to follow the contention of my eminent friend from Delaware; though I listen to him with delight and sometimes with information, as to the position he is assuming as the spokesman of his great party and now if he will but pause in his colloquy with his colleagues while I am speaking, and inspire himself with a little wisdom from this side, issued while I am speaking, he will find it to his present benefit and future welfare. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Delaware give heed to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I give heed all the time to the Senator from Illinois, but I am sorry to admit that I missed what the Senator just said.

Mr. LEWIS. There is no need for the Senator to apologize, but there is need for information on the part of the Senator, and therefore the Senator from Illinois sought to do that which charity would impose upon him to do, to lighten darkness with illumination. [Laughter.]

I said, and I repeat, it has ever been my pleasure to listen to the eminent Senator from Delaware as he has appeared before this body and inveighed against the validity of every act of the present administration. I heard him read the platform of the Democracy of 1932, and he pointed out where the charge was made that under what was known as the law called the "Smoot-Hawley law" large collections have been made from the beneficiaries for campaign purposes. The eminent Senator said he could not but see that the declaration was a falsity. It was written, said he, by those who could not have believed it, and therefore he denounces the charge as a prepared slander.

But the pending bill he denounces as he denounces the Chairman of the Tariff Commission. I regret that the Senator was not here when I called the attention to and read the opinions of the highest court in the exact words that the Chairman of the Commission gave to the committee—the words which the Senator denounces.

Mr. President, I realize that the position of the Senator from Delaware as chairman of the Senate committee for the election of Senators on the Republican side places him in direct opposition to one as chairman of the Democratic Senators which I occupy on behalf of the Democratic side. It is a matter concerning which I feel more or less flattered, and sometimes I have felt like suggesting to him that we both issue some sort of challenge and let the eminent leaders on both sides go to the country and join debate that the country may see the representatives and hear what they say, even including the Senator from Delaware.

I feel that the very exhibition of himself would be a source of considerable refreshment to the public to behold and to hear, because as I have heard the Senator, and as I have listened to him inveigh one way or the other in every form of declaration against everything that the administration has done, and holding it unworthy of any form of praise, and withholding any approval thereof on his part, I cannot but realize that the distinguished Senator has reached the point where he dreams to be saluted by the individuals in his locality, and everyone admiring him, as the Doughty Daredevil of Delaware. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have been waiting for about 5 minutes until the Senator could finish his sentence so I might not interrupt him, but I should like to say here and now that I am not willing to go out in a contest before the people with the Senator from Illinois to compare our looks, because I realize that the Senator from Illinois will entirely beat me on that score. But if it comes to the discussion of some question I shall then be glad to meet him any time, anywhere.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the Senator from Delaware that he does not need fear the comparison even of looks, because the community will behold by appearance how much smoother a man he is than is the Senator from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not know whether the Senator has reference to the fact that I shave every day and he does not.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have long since known that the eminent Senator had weapons of a rather smooth and cutting character dealing with all things, and if he finds them agreeable to apply to himself, that is a matter of his choice, yet I trust he does not cut farther from his face than his neck, because there might be serious consequences to follow in that it might cause a great loss to this body. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I desire to move toward the conclusion. Where is the eminent Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON]? If he can be found, I should like to have his attention for a moment. I recall the speeches of these eminent Senators, and particularly I refer to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], to whom I have paid my tribute.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield for the purpose of permitting me to suggest the absence of a quorum and asking for the call of the roll in order that I might get the Senator from Iowa into the Senate Chamber?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I would not ask that the whole of the Senate be called together in order that we bring about the presence of the Senator from Iowa, whose presence I intimated I desired. While I should be glad to have him present in the Chamber, let it be understood that I am content with the company I have—and its flattering audience.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator excuse me long enough so that I may step out and summon the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LEWIS. I should regret to lose the presence of the able Senator from Delaware, as I always delight in his presence, and I trust there may be a mutual contribution to both of us in being present while either is speaking.

I seek the Senator from Iowa, Mr. President, because I now behold his challenging colleague the Senator from Michigan, who has delivered very eminent addresses upon the subject in which this law and its proposed purposes are held by him in fulminating declaration as unconstitutional, and wholly invalid. Says the eminent Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] that if it is wholly useless, therefore it is unnecessary. It does nothing, he claims, except to frighten the public from all private business.

That if, on the other hand, it is useful, it is useful only (as I gather) to the destruction of the enterprises of which the eminent Senator from Michigan speaks. I am fascinated by the Senator from Michigan; I am interested in his splendid addresses. I was particularly intrigued by the excess of zeal that he discloses, on the indignation he suffers in the prospect of having something done that would interfere with the tariff privileges that are vested by the present act called "Smoot-Hawley law."

I particularly recall that the Senator from Michigan has from time to time in his very able addresses seen the prospects either of beet sugar being lessened in its value drawn from political favor or of possibility of automobiles no longer racing up Heaven's sun-lit path to the garage of the angels marked "Made in Detroit". He shudders in fear of some calamity arising from our enforcing the reform tariff laws. And finally I can see his tremor at prospective dangers to the great lumber interests of Michigan, which for generations have enjoyed monopolies but now may not be longer indulged in their rapacities upon the builders of homes needed to shelter the unhoused of America.

No one admires the distinguished Senator from Michigan more than I, and I salute him in the presence of his people. I address him as the master mentor of Michigan. In his arguments and in his debates I tender him as one who would not be exceeded in virtue or talent by anyone who could be sent here as a successor, as none have measured to him who have preceded him in his honorable place.

Mr. President, I am compelled to note that there is an engaging rivalry in this projected list of Presidential preferentials. There is the silver-crested corsair, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], the eminent Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], to whose capacious qualifications I have just alluded, the masterful abilities disclosed in the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. This much I am pleased to say, that if the time shall come when that party called Republican shall adopt some cleansing to give respectability to its past record, which only of late has so debased the Republic that its captains apologize each time they rise to speak of their party or its record—I say if it shall come to pass that there shall be an opportunity to present someone as its Presidential offering—as some lamb to slaughter as penance to inglorious sinfulness, the Chamber would delight to say there could be no finer trinity from which one could rewardingly be selected than from this guardsmen three—DICKINSON, of Iowa, HASTINGS, of Delaware, VANDENBERG, of Michigan! Gentlemen, take your choice! [Laughter.]

But I am moved, sir, to some serious consideration, and this is, Why denounce this measure in the terms you have and send out to your country the charge you are making from your very high place before the whole world, that the President of the United States is upon the eve of violating the Constitution of your country in every act that he assumes, and that now he is on the verge of not only violating the law but presenting himself before the countries of the world to negotiate some theory of authority in which this honorable body, the Senate, indicts him as a criminal under the Constitution and unworthy of the trust of his colleagues of administration?

What manner of statesmen are you, Senators, in an hour like this, when every country in the world is on the eve of breaking up in chaos and many flaming in the fires of revolution, that you are willing to incite your own people to turn against your own President and hold him before the world as one on the eve of setting his country into conflagration consuming it in the fires of anarchy, the destruction of communism, and the desolation of universal demolition.

You demonstrate, honorable Senators, how you are encouraging your disorderly to enter upon lawlessness, as you deprive your countrymen of confidence of its people or in themselves. Where do you think this summons to dismay and desolation will lead. Are you compensated for the flames you are blowing up in the thought of some partisan object being won for you and new office procured? Does this compensate you for picturing your President of America before the earth as one you are not willing to trust to negotiate a matter of trade agreements, where you have trusted 57 men of lesser stamp, named by you as commerce advisers, to the very same purpose, the very same object, and the very defined duty which has been written in this bill? What is it you dream upon as reparation for destroying the trust of your countrymen in their Nation and slaying the rising faith of the oppressed, as you bury the hope of your Government in the grave of despair and death?

I summon you again to answer, When have you ever exacted any one of these trade arrangements you made to be brought to this body for confirmation by the Senate? Where is one now, will you rise and call by name, that you have endorsed in the form of a treaty when it has engaged itself in all the solemn obligations with the greatest countries of the earth involving this, your land under the obligation of executing a contract?

It must be evident to all to what an extreme extent you find it agreeable to go to place your country in such a light that you might for a while excite the fears of your own people that they might return in compensation for those fears a contribution to the ballot box to elect someone to office from whom you have aspiration to benefit.

Senators, much time has been taken in the debate. I ask, What policy is there suggested in behalf of the President of the United States which is new? Where is there anything to speak of as revolutionary in the undertaking? The hour moves fast. The lands all around are seeking the most expeditious method of obtaining some relief from their condition. In February 1934 Italy adopted a system of parliamentary control by naming a committee known as "the grand council", for the purpose of negotiating tariff arrangements between Italy and this our land by commissioners.

At the same time, I invite your attention that France, on February 27, proceeded to announce the adoption of a system so that the tariff should now be changed from being consummated by a vote into a system of what they called their "new climax", to be submitted by a committee, and that committee have performed the duty under the arrangement, tendering them as an adoption on the part of the Government.

I call to your attention a statement with reference to the last debate in the Chamber of Deputies:

> After an all-night session, during which the clocks were stopped at midnight, the budget was finally adopted on February 28. On the same day the Chamber, by a vote of 430 to 157, passed a bill granting the Government power to change the existing tariffs by decree. This measure was passed in the senate by a show of hands.

Senators, are you merely asking your Government to do that which other governments have permitted to be done?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McCARRAN. At the appropriate point will the Senator yield for an inquiry which appertains to the very matter the Senator is now discussing, and I propound it for the purpose of developing the thought he is trying to develop and not to embarrass the Senator in any way?

Mr. LEWIS. I assure the able Senator that he will not embarrass me, but I am anxious for the Senator to realize that we are proceeding under limitation of debate. If the Senator will propound an inquiry, I shall be glad to respond to it at once.

Mr. McCARRAN. Would the Senator, for the purpose of emphasizing the thought he is trying to expound, kindly distinguish between the governments, the tripartite government we have with its constitutional limitations as to powers, and the form of government of those to which he has referred as delegating certain powers to certain organizations?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I regret the Senator was not here earlier. He would have had that discussion brought to his attention. I called attention that under our law, as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, an act which did not have the raising of revenue as its principal object is not within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution. Secondly, I called attention to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that an arrangement between the President that looks for a mere exchange of compacts is not a treaty within the meaning of the treaty law.

Therefore, since the Highest Court of our land has so defined it, I answer the able Senator by saying the governments to which I have alluded are much more liberal than the Government wherein we rest, for there the right of their tariff system is based on parliamentary privilege and not in pursuance of the Constitution. France does not occupy that attitude, but the will is directed by the people. It is the will of their people that orders the change.

I instance each, as detail reply. As to the Government of Italy, the Government of Italy had no constitutional basis such as ours. Hers is a military arrangement; but the only theory with her was the vote that will come directly from her elections. From her elections came some force which I do not approve in all respects, but which, nevertheless, is followed by the delivered decree to deal with us directly through a commission.

I say to my able friend: If one branch of the measure before us were for raising revenue, it would have to originate in the House of Representatives. If the other were for the making of a treaty, it would have to be ratified by this body. But where one is not for raising revenue, but for the mere exchange of goods upon an incidental basis, from which there may spring some form of expense that is not specifically a bill for raising revenue, it is not within the meaning of the Constitution, as I pointed out in the declaration of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Second, where it is an arrangement planted on the power of the Government to make a compact, a contract in the form of exchange of commodities, that is not a treaty. It does not pass between government and government. It is a mere passage between the instrumentalities of government of this commerce, as provided in the Constitution of the United States, with the privilege of the President of the United States.

That is my reply to my very able friend from Nevada.

I now come to England, and I call attention to what has lately transpired.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, before the Senator goes further, I am very glad to have the views of the learned Senator from Illinois; and I regret to know that in making his observations he seems to have forgotten the limitations of the organic law.

Mr. LEWIS. Of course, on those questions there will necessarily be dispute between eminent Senators such as occupy this body, because that turns, on the one hand, upon the construction of whether one thing or another is within the organic law, and, upon the other, what is the meaning of the organic law according to the viewpoint of each of the Senators from his studies of the past or as he views the matters in the present.

I return, sir. I now bring to your attention what occurred in March 1924. I call to your attention, sir, the so-called "protective tariff" which has lately been adopted in England.

On May 29, 1933, there arose what was known as the "agricultural marketing bill." The Labor Party began to contest the measure, and, therefore, I wish to bring to your attention the observation of Sir Stafford Cripps. When it was provided that a commission should be designated to arrange these interchanges of tariffs and interchanges of trade, said the representative of the labor forces, Sir Stafford Cripps:

> This is an excellent precedent, which will be followed widely in the future and seems to us in every way to be desired. We shall be delighted when, on future occasions (as ministers) we have to draw the attention of honorable Members opposite to the excellency of the precedent.

On July 5, 1933, sir, the order was first made, known as the "Import Duties Act", which authorized the commissioners to negotiate, in behalf of the council of England, directly with whoever might be commissioned from other countries, the full understanding and compact for the exchange of trade.

Mr. President, why shall we hesitate to avail ourselves of the advantages tendered by these governments, and adopt this system which could facilitate the purpose, instead of dragging it through long periods of debate such as we have seen before, thus destroying the very object of our undertaking?

Senators have said that these undertakings are invalid because, they claim, we are dealing hastily, merely because we contend an emergency justifies it and stand on the emergency as justification.

I wish to allude now to an observation of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

The Senator from Idaho announced in bold, enthusiastic eloquence the other day to what great depths of deprivation we were driving the Constitution, what elements of danger we were inviting now by assuming to do that which was not within the Constitution but sustained by us under the cry of an emergency.

There sits the distinguished and industrious Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. Here sits to my left the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN]. Has it been forgotten that when the La Follette-Costigan bill was before this body under the Hoover administration looking to some relief to be voted directly by the Treasury in behalf of the masses of misery and the misery of the masses, the honorable Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] rose to support the right of taking this money out of the Treasury on the ground of the emergency?

And when the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] contested with his honorable friend on the ground that the bill was invalid and unconstitutional, that it was in violation of the very principles of our Government, the distinguished Senator from Idaho turned upon the eminent Senator from Ohio, and, in flaming spontaneity, referred to the institutions of the country and the obstructions opposing the relief of the necessities of the poor. Then the Senator, contemplating the flag, said it was "but a dirty rag that contaminated the air against which it waved if it stood in the way of these reliefs." How, now, is it suddenly unconstitutional, when the relief is tendered from us on this side of the Chamber—to execute which the Senator rose to such high apostrophe, as he pinned it upon the flag of his country; and bade it rest upon the wavings and glorifications of the flag of the Union.

Mr. President, I desire to conclude these observations by saying that since the Supreme Court of the United States, both in the case from Minnesota and in the case from New York, lately held these extreme measures enforced upon us by necessity to be constitutional, I now ask you, Senators, and I ask you upon the honor of the souls within you, this question:

You have denounced these measures here and there as invalid. You have called them unconstitutional. You have time and time again warned your land that the Supreme Court would declare them unconstitutional. You struck every hope from the bosom of men; you smote every confidence from the prayers of a mother; you smothered every desire and dream of a future from all American mankind, as they looked forward to some relief. At what time since then has one of you had the courage of the manhood that is within you, to tell the country you were mistaken in the charge you made; that the courts have declared these very laws which you prophesied would be held invalid, to be wholly valid, completely constitutional, and that the courts are enforcing them by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States?

Not one of you has done so. You are willing to mislead the land. You either knew the laws were valid when you charged them with being invalid or you did not. And now that you find you were mistaken, was there not honor or statesmanship in you sufficient again to revive some confidence in the hearts of your countrymen and again to invite them to vest confidence in the courts of which heretofore you have boasted your very great worship? Now, when the hour is with you when you could have invited your countrymen to observe how the courts have sustained the contentions of the President of the United States or the administration, silence is all that comes from you—the exhibition of want of honor on the one hand or deliberate cowardice on the other. Gentlemen, you may take your choice. Senators, it is a deplorable situation, but it is one you must confront as the result of the history of your own action and the effect you have inflicted upon the Republic.

Mr. President, in presenting these legal attitudes and legal positions as I have proceeded to do, it was with no purpose of occupying the time of the Senate in a mere deliberative discussion of the legalistic phases of the subject. I wish to quote, sir, from the Supreme Court of the United States, where, in 285 U.S. 262, the Court says:

> This Court has the power to prevent an experiment. We may strike down the statute which embodies it on the ground that in our opinion the measure is arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable. We have power to do this, because the due-process clause has been held by the Court applicable to matters of substantive laws as well as to matters of procedure. But in the exercise of this high power, we must be ever on our guard, lest we erect our prejudices into legal principles. If we would guide by the light of reason, we must let our minds be bold.

Mr. President, I have concluded the precedents of the law. I have a conclusion which I dare impress upon my honorable opponents.

At a time like this, when your countrymen are crying to you for rescue, when your Nation is beseeching from you support of its institutions; when patriotism demands that you present your country as worthy of the world, is there nothing in you that will obey some instinct of the true American? Is there nothing in all the administration of this Government that you can praise? Is there no measure to which you can give your approval? Is there no action of President or Congress you can endorse? Is there not one kind word to be said in behalf of the man at the White House who, bearing burdens the like of which we cannot describe by words, carries on, that he may keep faith with his countrymen and be true to his Nation?

Can you not before the world give one small testimonial in behalf of your own America?

If you cannot do that from a political conviction, if you still adhere to the enjoyment of criticism because of opportunity to condemn where you may profit, then I summon you to the solemn proclamation of the master director of governmental justice, when, concluding his great oration, St. Paul proclaims, as the Spirit of Heaven now appeals to you—as your debt to men and duty to nation—

> Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things—

I demand as your duty to God and country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

To the Congress:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 16 of the act of March 3, 1933 (ch. 212, 47 Stat. 1489, 1517), as amended by title III of the act of March 20, 1933 (ch. 3, 48 Stat. 8, 16), I am transmitting herewith an Executive order revoking section 4 of Executive Order No. 6166 of June 10, 1933, insofar as and to the extent that it is applicable to the disbursing functions under the jurisdiction of the War Department, the Navy Department (including the Marine Corps), and the Panama Canal, except those pertaining to departmental salaries and expenses in the District of Columbia.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 29, 1934.

BANK INDEMNITY BONDS

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement of facts regarding Senate bill 2915, requiring national banks to obtain indemnity bonds from State-qualified bonding companies.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FACTS IN CONNECTION WITH NEELY BILL, S. 2915

A very large number of banks in this country carry the insurance referred to in the above bill in companies chartered or licensed to do business in the States in which such banks are respectively located. Some banks, however, carry such insurance in London Lloyds, an organization composed of groups of underwriters operating from London, England.

The laws of the several States and regulations of the Treasury Department make certain requirements as a condition to be licensed to do business. Briefly these requirements are:

1. A minimum capital and surplus must be subscribed and paid in.
2. Such capital and surplus must be in cash or in specified classes of securities.
3. Adequate reserves must be carried for losses, unearned premiums, and other special purposes.
4. Each company, as a condition to doing business in a State or with the Government, must be licensed or admitted to do business.
5. Many States, as a condition to the issuance of a license, require a substantial deposit consisting of securities or the giving of qualifying bonds in large penalties, or both.
6. Some States require that an admitted company must reinsure only in other admitted companies.
7. Admitted companies must appoint attorneys upon whom process may be served.
8. Annual statements must be made as the law requires and must be filed with the insurance department for audit.
9. Each licensed company is subject to visitation and examination, at its own expense, by the insurance department of the State where organized and of each State in which licensed.
10. An admitted company must appoint agents, who are required to be licensed, and in many of the States a company cannot execute a policy unless executed through a resident licensed agent, who shall receive full commissions.
11. Each company must pay, in accordance with the laws of each State where it does business, taxes on premiums, taxes on capital assets, franchise taxes, State and municipal license fees and taxes, agents' fees, and all other forms of taxes.
12. Each company of a State doing business in another State must comply with the reciprocal laws thereof.
13. According to the laws of a number of the States and the regulations of the United States Treasury Department, a licensed or admitted company may not expose itself on any single risk in excess of 10 percent of its capital and surplus.
14. In several States a licensed company must file its rates with the insurance department for approval, and then the rates must be justified before the insurance department by experience, and cannot be increased without its approval.
15. No licensed company shall discriminate as to rate against any insured in the same class.

The situation as to Lloyds is as follows:

1. London Lloyds does not have any capital or surplus.
2. London Lloyds, not being admitted in any State except Illinois, in which it is said to have deposited $250,000 for the protection of policyholders in Illinois, is not subject to any of the laws and regulations which apply to licensed companies as above set forth.
3. London Lloyds does not, except possibly in Illinois, pay any taxes which admitted companies are required to pay.
4. The 3-percent stamp tax which is imposed by the revenue law of 1924 applies only to alien companies and associations which do not issue their policies through a licensed agent or officer resident in any State or district of the United States in which it is authorized to do business. Therefore if Lloyds issues a policy covering a risk in Illinois the 3-percent stamp tax is not required to be paid. If Lloyds signs in Illinois a bond or policy covering a risk in any other State, the 3-percent stamp tax is not required to be paid.

Thirty-seven companies out of 48 companies doing a surety business or a surety and casualty business combined have more than $300,000,000 invested in Government, State, and municipal bonds and in bonds of industrial corporations of the United States.

Thirty-five of these companies had in their employ on December 31, 1933, 29,292 employees and paid in salaries during the year 1933, $48,307,831.

Forty-one of these companies paid during 1933 in taxes and license fees to the United States and the various States and subdivisions thereof $9,285,101.

According to the New York insurance report, stock companies doing in New York a surety business or a surety and casualty business combined had on deposit in the banks throughout the United States on December 31, 1932, about $50,000,000. In addition, the officers, employees, and agents of surety companies carry deposits in banks.

The purpose of the bill is not to exclude any insurer from any of the States but to force every insurer which writes a policy covering a risk in a State, to be licensed in such State and to be subject to all of the laws that are applicable to admitted insurers.

The Neely bill has been endorsed by the executive committee of the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners of the United States.

Canada, in 1932, passed an act entitled "An act respecting Canadian and British insurance companies." Under this act, Lloyds is required to be licensed and to comply with the very comprehensive requirements of the act before it can issue policies in Canada.

AMENDMENTS TO THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BYRD

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, on last Monday, May 28, 1934, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] delivered a very illuminating and informative address over the National Broadcasting Co. network on the proposed amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am a Democrat who has supported with my vote in the United States Senate most of the recommendations of the administration. I was one of 27 Senators who supported President Roosevelt in his greatest legislative crisis when the Congress overrode his veto and largely increased the appropriations. He has no admirer who rejoices more at his deserved popularity and the inspired leadership he has furnished to the American people during the dark days of the economic depression.

I say this because I want those who hear me tonight to know that what I say in opposition to certain policies is spoken as a friend, and because of my conviction that such policies are inconsistent with the ideals of the Democratic Party, contrary to the Democratic platform, and will sooner or later, if continued, consolidate so many different elements of opposition as to menace, if not destroy, the broad program of economic recovery sponsored by the President.

Tonight I speak in opposition to amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act which, if adopted, will make the Secretary of Agriculture the supreme dictator over every producer of agricultural commodities and those who handle such products.

I like and admire Secretary Wallace. I have been impressed with the frankness with which he has stated his position on the problems confronting the farmers, but such powers as he now requests should never be conferred upon a bureau official in a democratic country. A farmer myself, I have supported the Secretary in every reasonable recommendation he has made to Congress.

It is the principle of the continuing extension of regulatory powers over every business activity to which I desire to register my protest. The platform adopted by the Democratic Party assured the American people that unnecessary and unwise regulatory laws would be repealed and our Government restored to the people with the least possible interference with our private affairs consistent with orderly government. By this I do not mean that evils that have heretofore existed should not be eradicated; but the average American should be permitted to conduct his legitimate business operations without the fear of criminal prosecution by his Government, or harsh and threatening treatment from autocratic bureau heads.

In the face of this assurance in the Democratic platform we see today a bureaucracy being rapidly built up here at Washington to control the daily activities of our people such as no one has before even remotely suggested or anticipated. Step by step the bureau chiefs are establishing new power to regiment the American people in all their daily activities.

As a people we are temperamentally opposed to such dictation, and every such effort in the past has failed. Are we likely to succeed when our Government attempts to tell all who are engaged in business operations what they shall do or shall not do, even down to the most minute details? Essentially, the regulatory provisions affecting the daily lives of our people are not only absurd but impossible to accomplish. The detailed activities of a country as vast as ours cannot be administered from Washington. Such efforts impose great costs upon the people, for it means an army of bureaucrats, most of whom are without practical experience.

I voted for the Agricultural Adjustment Act in its original form. I did so because of my belief that an orderly reduction in the production of certain crops in this country is wise and that such reduction should be brought about in a systematic way and compensation provided for those farmers who agree to reduce their crops. With respect to the agricultural commodities known as "basic commodities", this plan is now in operation by voluntary agreements, and the farmers are being compensated with the processing taxes for leaving their land out of cultivation.

The spokesmen for the administration call the new amendments merely "clarifying" and contend that they already have the power they now request. The simple answer to this is, why ask for additional legislation if the power already exists? The plain truth is that the proposed amendments confer vast additional power on the Secretary of Agriculture. The only thing clarifying in the proposed legislation is to make the Secretary the czar of agriculture and the farmers of America will have little more liberty than the peasants in Soviet Russia.

Without going into details which may be tiresome, it is sufficient to say that one of the proposed amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act will give to the Secretary of Agriculture the arbitrary power to control every farmer who obtains a benefit payment for a reduction in a specific crop as to what such farmer can plant and produce on his entire farm, even down to chickens and turkeys. At present the Secretary only has the power to say what shall be produced on the land that he leases and removes from cultivation. This present power he should have, but merely because a farmer receives perhaps $50 or $100 or less for removing from cultivation certain land planted to one of the basic agricultural commodities, the Secretary should not have the authority to take control of his entire farm.

But section 3 invades even more offensively the liberties of the farmers, because this section establishes a licensing system for food producers, distributors, and handlers, and denies the right of shipment in interstate commerce, if the Secretary declines to license. Under this broad provision licenses can be required, first, of the producer or farmer and then of every handler of that particular product down to the corner grocer who finally sells to the ultimate consumer. The licenses are issued upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary to effectuate the declared policy of this act and the restoration of normal economic conditions in the marketing and/or financing of such commodities or products, and this broad language gives him supreme authority.

Remember the existing law largely limits the authority of the Secretary to the basic commodities, and any licensing power now given specifically provides that such licenses shall be subject to such terms and conditions not in conflict with existing acts of Congress or regulations pursuant thereto, as may be necessary to eliminate unfair practices, etc. In other words, the proposed legislation omits the safeguard now existing that licenses shall be issued subject to such terms and conditions not in conflict with existing law and regulations. The new legislation specifically gives the Secretary the right to license a producer who processes or distributes his own product. Processing may mean preparing a product for the market. Therefore, a farmer who packs and ships in interstate commerce a bushel of potatoes or a basket of strawberries would be subject to being required to apply to Washington to obtain a license, if the Secretary of Agriculture so commanded.

This new legislation provides for a quota system or production so that the Secretary can establish quota restrictions upon the recommendation of two-thirds of the producers of a given commodity. A new provision is then inserted giving the Secretary the right to have access to all books and records and papers under the control of the licensee, notwithstanding the protection that the fourth amendment of the Constitution gives to all such papers and private records. Another new section provides that the district courts of the United States are vested with the power in injunction to restrain any person from handling any agricultural commodity without a license when such handling has been prohibited by the Secretary of Agriculture.

It would be possible for the Secretary of Agriculture even without the recommendation of two-thirds of the growers to establish shipping quotas, directing to what markets and to what extent certain products can be shipped, as well as to give to distributors a definite quota as to the quantity of each commodity such distributor can sell. The Secretary also, in my judgment, can under these amendments fix the price for agricultural products.

When it comes to the penalties for violations of the act, the courts are set aside and the Secretary takes the place of both court and jury. If a license is issued in accordance with law, namely, to carry out the policies of the act and to bring about normal economic conditions of marketing, etc. (and this gives the greatest possible latitude to the Secretary and makes him virtually the sole judge), then his decision is not reviewable by the courts and he has the power to fine those who ship without a license the sum of $1,000 a day, or, in his mercy, a lesser amount, and the penalty shall be payable to the Treasury of the United States and recoverable in a civil suit brought in the name of the United States.

Theoretically, only Congress has the power to tax, but under this proposed legislation the Secretary is given the right to prescribe operating funds for any of his activities and to police the farmers and to require any licensee to pay any such amount in such manner and to such person as the Secretary may direct. Failure to pay what the Secretary decides is necessary will be ground for revocation of the license, which means that the person holding such license cannot thereafter ship in interstate commerce. This arbitrary tax is in addition to other appropriations and processing taxes provided in the original Agricultural Adjustment Act, and contains no safeguard whatsoever as to the use for which the money is to be expended, or the number of agents to be employed or the salaries to be paid. The Secretary could hire as large a staff of policemen, inspectors, auditors, and clerks, as he desired, and impose this cost upon those who obtain the licenses, which will fall upon the farmer.

Never in the history of America has such an authorization of power covering so many people been requested by a departmental head. Even in the N.R.A. committees and others had a voice before General Johnson acted.

Mr. Wallace says he will not exercise all the power requested, but my experience has been that sooner or later, whenever the authority is vested in a bureau of the Government, this power is exercised. If he does not intend to use this additional power, he should not ask Congress to grant it to him. Congress should only grant power on the assumption that it will be used to the fullest extent. Even if it is not technically used, distributors of food could be forced to do things of which they do not approve or desire by the threat of the use of this autocratic power.

While I am in the Senate of the United States I shall never vote to confiscate the property of worthy citizens of this country without due process of law, and adequate compensation, at the whim and fancy of some bureau chief by giving him the power to deny shipment of commodities in interstate commerce.

We are suffering today as much from underconsumption and loss of our world markets as overproduction. We need more purchasing power at home and a greater outlet to foreign markets. Harsh and unreasonable restrictions arbitrarily imposed will mean disaster to millions of farmers in this country, and those farmers must then seek other means of employment in the face of the millions we have already unemployed in industry.

As Congress adjourns, the defeat of these amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act is imperative, so that the people will realize that the constant extension of regulatory powers over business and agriculture has been halted. People would at once get relief from a sense of oppression and feel that they could breathe again as free men and women. The wisest thing for Congress to do is to adjourn and give the people of America an opportunity to digest the laws that have been enacted and let nature take its course. Prosperity will never return by the waiving of magic wands or by legislative panaceas, but only by the industry and the ability of the people themselves.

Under the reign of the Czars of Russia no person could build an addition to his house, even in a remote part of the empire, without first obtaining permission from some underling in St. Petersburg. Is America coming to this? Woodrow Wilson once remarked that "The history of liberty is a history of the limitation of governmental power, not the increase of it. When we resist, therefore, the concentration of power, we are resisting the processes of death, because concentration of power is what always precedes the destruction of human liberties."

I am one who still believes in the greatest individual freedom of the citizen in his business as in his personal affairs. Under the stress of economic depression or during times of war the Government may be compelled to temporarily take extraordinary steps which restrict the liberties we naturally possess. But the operation and direction of business by the Government destroys the fiber and initiative of the people, and is a danger we should zealously guard against. We do not want a Hitler of American agriculture, even though we have confidence in the present Secretary of Agriculture. Nor do we want an army of governmental parasites traveling around the country at public expense to tell the 40,000,000 farmers of America what to do each day. For myself I believe the Democratic Party has always been and should continue to be a guardian and champion of the individual rights and personal freedom bequeathed to us as a sacred heritage by those great Americans who fought and died that we may enjoy the blessing of a free democracy in this land. When the Democratic Party ceases to be an instrument to defend these principles and in fact actively espouses contrary policies of government, then it fails of its purpose and will not command the confidence and support of the people.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 30, 1934

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pause in Thy presence with grateful testimony for Thy loving providence, which is a river of blessing flowing from under Thy throne. We beseech Thee to let this stream of cleansing purify, enlighten, and idealize our national life. Do Thou appeal to that instinct of recovery, to that temper of hope which Thou hast established in every human breast. This day of memory, blessed Lord, may it be one of consecration to the United States of the Republic. Draw every section of our land toward a more complete knowledge of righteousness, fraternity, and brotherhood. Graciously be with our President and with every citizen of every station. Blessed Lord, may our institions not fail through our misuse of them, and because of our sins against God and man. O God, let this truth be emphasized: There is no wrong that may not be righted and no industrial strife that cannot be solved by free obedience to our Christian institutions. O do Thou lift our people higher and higher into that sweeter and purer air where peace and tranquillity dwell, and where fret and fever pass away. A heavy hand has been laid upon us in the removal of another distinguished Member of our congressional family. Comfort the family in that love which encircles us all. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

RELIEF FOR DISBURSING OFFICERS OF THE ARMY

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask unanimous consent to file a supplementary report on the bill (S. 2046) to provide relief for disbursing officers of the Army in certain cases.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

SILVER PURCHASE

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 401 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 9745, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That, after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. BYRNS. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw that. We will lose all the advantage we gained by meeting at 11 o'clock. We will just have to remain here that much longer tonight.

Mr. LAMNECK. I do not care if we stay here 2 weeks. I want all the Members to be present and see us continue the depression for another 10 years.

Mr. BYRNS. I have asked the telephone clerk to call the Members, and they are coming in as rapidly as they can.

Mr. LAMNECK. I insist upon the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

SILVER PURCHASE ACT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that the rule as presented provides for only 2 hours of general debate on this bill; but we had an understanding that in the event the House were permitted to meet at 11 o'clock the general debate would be for 3 hours. At the appropriate time, before the adoption of the resolution, I will offer an amendment making the period of general debate 3 hours instead of 2 hours.

I am not going to discuss this rule or undertake to discuss the bill. The main purpose, of course, of a resolution of this sort is to put the bill on its way for consideration. There will be a wide controversy, I imagine, with reference to the terms of this bill, which will be taken care of by the gentlemen on the committee and others who may not be on the committee.

With that preliminary statement, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] on the rule.

I now yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, some time ago the President of the United States made a proclamation with reference to silver. I remember the distinguished Speaker of this House said it was only a bite at the cherry. I think this bill is a bite at a lemon. I am against this bill, and I am against this rule. It is a gag rule, and if this House adopts this rule it will confirm what I have had a suspicion of ever since I have been in Congress, and that is that representative Government in America is dead.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield? I yielded to the gentleman at his request, and I knew his opinion about this matter; but will the gentleman kindly point out how this is in any sense a gag rule?

Mr. FIESINGER. We are attempting under this rule to discuss a question that is little known, that is hazy in the minds of practically all the Members of this House, including myself. We are given 3 hours to debate a question that seriously affects and vitally contacts every man, woman, and child, present and future, not only in the United States but everywhere in the world.

The rule gives but 3 hours to discuss such a proposition, and in this limited time the Members of the House who have given the most study to the subject will hardly be able to speak on it at all. A matter of such importance and such far-reaching effect, if we are not operating under a gag rule, will give some time to the discussion of each and every important section of this bill. And if a debate so limited is not gag rule, then I do not know what a gag rule is.

I will also say that I have had but a limited time in which to study this bill, as have the rest of you; entirely too limited a time. I have, however, made a study of the questions involved in this important and far-reaching problem for over two years and a half, a most intensive study; but I do not know what the full implications of this bill are. I can see secret pitfalls in it. And I can see a surrender of principles in the power it conveys that our forefathers struggled to bequeath to us. And I see in it also the first step in a long road of grief and error. They say it is the best that we can do. That is the excuse that I have heard from Members of the other body and from Members of this body. If we are going to rest legislation upon that principle, if we cannot in this body take a few days or a week, if necessary, to enact legislation of such importance, then I say that we are gagged and that representative government in America is dead.

The bill we are about to consider absolutely disregards all the historical lessons with reference to money that we have learned in our past experience, and it ignores what we have learned with reference to monetary legislation in this country since the beginning of our history.

There is no philosophy back of it, no monetary principle enters into this bill which defends us from the methods of exploitation, which our studies of this subject in the Coinage Committee have clearly shown to call for defense. And I know we can have the defense we need if we will recognize the need for it. This bill was drawn in the Treasury Department—by whom we do not know; I do not know and you do not know—and I dare say the authorship of the bill will not be revealed upon this floor today. It was written in the Treasury Department; it was introduced in the House, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. From that on all that I know is what I have read about it in the newspapers. I was not notified of the meeting of that committee; I was not invited to appear before it. They had one witness before that committee outside of possibly those men in the Treasury, and I do not know who those men are, or if they have ever studied this subject from this angle of approach, I speak of, namely to defend our people from these depressions.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I should like to know the source of the gentleman's information that there was only one witness.

Mr. FIESINGER. I did not say only one witness. I said so far as I read from the newspapers there was only one witness from the Congress of the United States, but that there were witnesses who came from the Treasury Department.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is a new statement.

Mr. FIESINGER. Not at all; and the RECORD will bear me out.

I cannot have time to discuss this bill, but I am telling you this is the most far-reaching legislation that this Congress will ever vote upon. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL].

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, since the duty has been assigned to me to explain this bill I am not going to take up any time in a preliminary statement but shall get to the point as directly as possible and discuss the matter as briefly as I can in order to complete in 15 minutes a statement covering the bill.

Of course, this is not a gag rule. The rule under which this bill is to be considered gives just as much privilege to the Members of the House to offer amendments germane to the subject matter of the bill, and to discuss the bill under the 5-minute rule as if no rule had been reported. Nor is this bill one which grants additional powers insofar as the Government is concerned in the matter of the purchase of silver and the issuance of currency on silver so purchased as a monetary base. It does prescribe an additional method by which powers already existing in the executive department may be exercised in the matter of the purchase of silver, the issuance of silver coins and the issuance of silver certificates based upon silver reserves and redeemable in standard silver dollars.

Section 1 of the bill simply names the act and gives it a title.

Section 2 declares the policy of the Congress relative to the proportion of silver and gold as the metallic bases in our monetary stocks, and is mandatory, requiring the Treasury Department to maintain as a policy a proportion of 25 percent of silver in relationship to the entire monetary metallic stock. That will be 25 percent silver and 75 percent gold. That is the declared policy under the bill, which is mandatory and makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase or to sell as the necessities may require, silver in order to maintain that proportion of 25 to 75 as between silver and gold as the metallic bases.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. PARSONS. Why was it necessary to establish three prices for silver in the bill? In one instance the price is fixed at 50 cents an ounce at the present time; the price on newly mined silver is fixed at 64½ cents an ounce; and there is a third price-fixing section which would allow the Secretary of the Treasury to pay still a different price. Will the gentleman not explain this feature of the bill?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I will reach those points as I proceed.

Section 3 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver at home or abroad for present or future delivery with silver certificates or any other kind of currency or coin of the United States, or with direct obligations of the Government, in order to bring this proportion of 25 to 75 in proper adjustment under the mandatory provision of section 2.

In section 3 it is also provided that no purchase of silver situated in the continental United States on May 1, 1934, shall be made hereunder at a price in excess of 50 cents a fine ounce. This is a temporary provision. It is temporary in the sense that when all silver stocks which were available May 1, 1934, have been purchased or brought into the vaults of the Treasury, the 50-cent limitation will no longer apply. Anticipating silver legislation there has been a certain amount of speculation in silver purchases. Speculators have bought silver at a low price and are holding it for an increased price awaiting the time when legislation such as this may be passed, thereby enhancing the market price of silver and yielding a handsome profit, a speculative profit, to the dealers in silver.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. How much silver was there in the continental United States on May 1 of this year?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The figure is indefinite. The estimate is that there were between 150,000,000 and 250,000,000 ounces.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further at this point?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman mean to convey the thought that in nationalizing or commandeering this silver they are going to pay only 50 cents an ounce under section 3, on page 2, when section 7 of the bill, which proposes the nationalization of silver, mentions a fair price which is to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I told the gentleman previously that I would discuss this point when I got to it in my explanation of the bill.

Mr. PARSONS. I want to know why the gentleman believes that if we nationalize silver we will pay but 50 cents an ounce?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The reason for this proviso limiting the purchase price to 50 cents a fine ounce for silver available as of May 1 is for the simple reason that we do not care to make this legislation a vehicle for speculative profits to those who have purchased silver anticipating the legislation.

When these stocks are exhausted, by voluntary purchase or otherwise, the 50-cent limitation will have no further application. You must bear in mind in connection with this section and this provision that the proclamation of the President under which the Treasury is buying at this time the newly mined silver in the United States and paying 64½ cents an ounce for it is still in force. We are not disturbing that at all, and it does not come under this particular provision, but stands out as a continuing authority under the proclamation issued by the President under the legislation passed in the early part of this session.

Mr. SABATH. This only applies to silver which is now held by speculators?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is all. It reaches the speculators. I might as well at this time go to section 7 and the particular point which the gentleman from Illinois raised.

The Government will buy this silver through voluntary contracts if possible; but if an individual in the United States has a stock of silver and does not want to sell it and will not voluntarily agree to sell it, then the Government has the power under section 7 to commandeer that silver. That is, to order it into the mint, exercising the power of eminent domain, and acquiring the silver against the will of the owner. Under this exercise of the power of eminent domain we must pay the fair market price for it. It is simply a question of constitutional requirement. You may contract voluntarily at any price you may agree upon; but if the Government in the exercise of its sovereign power says, "You must bring your silver into the mint", then the Government under the constitutional requirement must pay for this property, under the due-process and just-compensation clauses, the fair market value of the commodity so commandeered.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And may I say that if the fair market value as ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury does not meet the mind of the parties who own the silver, the owners of said silver will have their day in United States Court of Claims to ascertain what the fair market value of the silver is.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman from Kentucky is correct.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. When the Government marked up the value of gold, it took the position that all of that appreciation belonged to the people of the country—the Government, in fact. Why should they not do the same thing with silver? If they mark up the price of silver, why should not the Government itself get the benefit of this increase in price?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I am sure the gentleman from New York will recognize the difference between the value of gold and silver; that is, the monetary value of each with relation to the market value of each. The monetary value of gold is the same as the market value of gold. The monetary value of silver is not the same as the market value of silver.

Mr. SNELL. Right there, what is the difference?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. May I say you have mandatory provisions here; then you have the permissive powers. The mandatory provision is to issue silver certificates equal to the market value the Government paid for the silver. The permissive power granted here will permit the issuance of currency as against the difference between the market value of the silver and its statutory value, or $1.29 an ounce. In other words, such difference is kept as a reserve against which other currency may issue.

Mr. SNELL. Who gets the benefit?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. As a reserve you may have additional currency issued against it. Of course, the Treasury and the people of the United States get the benefit. The difference between the market value and the statutory value is a benefit to our country regardless of the bookkeeping arrangement in the Treasury.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield further.

These matters will be discussed by other Members. I must hurry through if I am to refer to all the provisions of the bill.

Section 4 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell silver when it is necessary to maintain the proportion between the silver and the gold stocks. That is, if the silver stocks become greater than 25 percent of the entire monetary stock and also if the market value of silver exceeds $1.29 per fine ounce.

Section 5 provides that you cannot, through this authority to sell, reduce the silver stocks in the vaults of the Treasury below the point where the monetary value of these silver stocks is less than the face value of the silver certificates outstanding.

Mr. KELLER. What is meant by "monetary value"?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. That is $1.29 an ounce.

Section 6 confers the powers that are necessary in order to enable the Government in the exercise of its sovereign right under the Constitution to coin and regulate the value of money. It puts such powers within the control of the Executive that he may, if conditions require, prohibit or regulate the importation or the exportation of silver. He may regulate or prohibit the acquisition of silver. He may regulate or prohibit the transportation of silver. In other words, he can absolutely freeze the commerce in silver if the necessities of the case require, but the necessities of the case must be such as will be necessary to effectuate the policies of this act.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield for a short question.

Mr. CULKIN. May I inquire from the gentleman or someone in charge of the bill what the effect of this measure, particularly section 6, will be upon stocks of silver held for industrial purposes?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It has no effect at all.

Mr. CULKIN. Is there any such provision in the bill?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It is excluded because under the provisions of the bill it is not included.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to refuse to yield further. I have discussed section 7 as fully as I can in the limited time I have.

Section 8 is the taxing provision of the bill and applies to the profits on silver stocks held speculatively. It does not apply to the provisions of section 7, where the Government takes the silver under the power of eminent domain. Nor does it apply to newly mined silver now being purchased under the proclamation of the President. It applies where the Government, by voluntary contract with the owner, buys silver at a price in advance of the cost to the owner of the silver and takes 50 percent of the profit. This is a stamp tax and has the same provisions for administration as are now in the revenue laws for the collection of other stamp taxes. It provides against increasing the base price of the owner of the silver through manipulations known as "wash sales", by fixing a date 30 days or more before the effective date of the act, namely, April 30, behind which speculators in silver may not, in anticipation of this character of legislation, through these so-called "wash sales", raise the cost base and thereby lower the margin of profit for tax purposes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The date is April 15 instead of April 30.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Yes; April 15 instead of April 30.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the remainder of the bill deals largely with definitions, which I shall not take the time to discuss, but I want to say just one word in the nature of a general statement.

This bill does not add to the powers already in the President as to the purchase of silver and the issuance of silver certificates. It simply declares as a mandatory policy that the proportion between silver and gold in the monetary stocks shall be as 25 to 75.

Under the Thomas amendment to the Farm Credit Act, the President has unlimited power to buy silver and issue silver coin and silver certificates therefor. He has the power, under the Thomas amendment, to go to an absolutely free and unlimited coinage of silver. This bill does not go that far, yet it does raise the proportion existing at the present time as between the silver money stocks and the total money stocks from about 10.5 percent to 25 percent.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Did I get the idea that the President at the present time can put silver and gold on a 50-50 basis if he wants to?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Absolutely.

Mr. KELLER. Why should we change that power?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. We make it mandatory that he must bring it up to 25 and 75.

Mr. KELLER. Under this bill he cannot go beyond that?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. He cannot go beyond that; no.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I think the Membership of the House should realize the predicament in which the individual members of the Ways and Means Committee find themselves.

In the first place, it has not been customary for the Ways and Means Committee to consider legislation of this character. The only reason this bill comes to the Ways and Means Committee for consideration is because of the tax feature of the bill. I think I am well within my rights and that I am not reflecting on any individual member of the Ways and Means Committee when I say that the members have not had occasion to specialize in legislation dealing with money. We have usually confined our activities to the matter of taxation. So it is with some hesitation that I come before the House to discuss this question; but I have been impressed by the fact, as most of you have been, that our Government has been purchasing silver at the rate of about 24,421,410 ounces a year. President Roosevelt has this authority and has exercised it.

It is rather significant that during the time this Government has been purchasing silver we have been selling our gold abroad. If you will look at this bill—and I call your attention to section 3—you will see that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase silver at home or abroad.

The gold has been taken away from the people of this country and the profit is supposed to have accrued to the people of this country, and a distinguished Member from New York [Mr. SNELL] has raised the question of why the silver should not be taken over and all the profits eliminated.

Another very significant fact which I wish to call to the attention of the House is the long list of speculators who have been acquiring silver.

You will find about 50 closely printed pages of the hearings giving the names of the individuals and firms who have been buying silver. There is no question but that the persons and firms shown in this list realized that this legislation would eventually come before the Congress and would be passed, and they felt they were taking no chances whatever in accumulating a large amount of silver for speculative purposes.

If you will examine this bill a little further you will begin to see the handwriting on the wall. You will find that in order to throw up a smoke screen, on page 7, line 20, it is provided:

(1) With respect to all transfers of any interest in silver bullion after the enactment of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, and (2) with respect to all transfers of any interest in silver bullion on or after May 15, 1934, and prior to the enactment of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, except that in such cases it shall be paid by the transferor in such manner and at such time as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulations prescribe, and the requirement of a memorandum of such transfer shall not apply.

That is, the tax is supposed to have been made retroactive, leading people to believe that the speculators would have to pay the tax, but you will notice in section 12 it says:

If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

This retroactive provision holds no terrors for speculators in silver. They have the best lawyers money can hire. They know very well from the decisions of the courts that a retroactive tax is unconstitutional. The distinction between a retroactive tax as upheld in the income tax law and the retroactive tax in this bill has been made clear by Supreme Court decisions. They are going to escape the tax; they are going to realize their profit.

This bill, like all silver bills coming before Congress, is simply a speculators' bill, and the people will have to pay the price of embarking on this insane piece of silver legislation.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. Does the gentleman intend to call attention to the individuals in the list that he speaks of?

Mr. REED of New York. No; I am going to leave that to some other person.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is evident that they are in it for profit.

Mr. REED of New York. There is no question about that. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to a message sent to a special session of Congress called by President Cleveland, dealing with the silver question. This was August 8, 1893. Here is one paragraph:

Our unfortunate financial plight is not the result of untoward events nor of conditions related to our natural resources, nor is it traceable to any of the afflictions which frequently check national growth and prosperity. With plenteous crops, with abundant promise of remunerative production and manufacture, with unusual invitations to safe investment, and with satisfactory assurance to business enterprise, suddenly financial distrust and fear have sprung up on every side. Numerous moneyed institutions have suspended because abundant assets were not immediately available to meet the demands of frightened depositors. Surviving corporations and individuals are content to keep in hand the money they are usually anxious to loan, and those engaged in legitimate business are surprised to find that the securities they offer for loans, though heretofore satisfactory, are no longer accepted. Values supposed to be fixed are fast becoming conjectural, and loss and failure have invaded every branch of business.

Then further on he says:

Undoubtedly the monthly purchases by the Government of 4,500,000 ounces of silver, enforced under that statute, were regarded by those interested in silver production as a certain guaranty of its increase in price. The result, however, has been entirely different, for immediately following a spasmodic and slight rise, the price of silver began to fall after the passage of the act, and has since reached the lowest point ever known. This disappointing result has led to renewed and persistent efforts in the direction of free-silver coinage.

Then he calls attention further:

If, as many of its friends claim, silver ought to occupy a larger place in our currency and the currency of the world through general international cooperation and agreement, it is obvious that the United States will not be in a position to gain a hearing in favor of such an arrangement so long as we are willing to continue our attempt to accomplish the result single-handed.

I asked in the hearings if we were taking an initial step in an international agreement, and the answer was in the affirmative. We are taking this step and yet we have no assurance that other nations will enter into the agreement at all.

Then President Cleveland further says:

The knowledge in business circles among our own people that our Government cannot make its fiat equivalent to intrinsic value nor keep inferior money on a parity with superior money by its own independent efforts has resulted in such a lack of confidence at home in the stability of currency values that capital refuses its aid to new enterprises, while millions are actually withdrawn from the channels of trade and commerce to become idle and unproductive in the hands of timid owners. Foreign investors, equally alert, not only decline to purchase American securities, but make haste to sacrifice those which they already have.

Then further he says:

The people of the United States are entitled to a sound and stable currency and to money recognized as such on every exchange and in every market of the world. The Government has no right to injure them by financial experiments opposed to the policy and practice of other civilized states, nor is it justified in permitting an exaggerated and unreasonable reliance on our national strength and ability to jeopardize the soundness of the people's money.

This matter rises above the plane of party politics. It vitally concerns every business and calling and enters into every household in the land. There is one important aspect of the subject which especially should never be overlooked. At times like the present, when the evils of unsound finance threatens us, the speculator may anticipate a harvest gathered from the misfortune of others, the capitalist may protect himself by hoarding or may even find profit in the fluctuation of values; but the wage earner—the first to be injured by a depreciated currency and the last to receive the benefit of its correction—is practically defenseless. He relies for work upon the ventures of confident and contented capital. This failing him, his condition is without alleviation, for he can neither prey on the misfortunes of others nor hoard his labor. One of the greatest statesmen our country has known, speaking more than 50 years ago, when the derangement of the currency had caused commercial distress, said:

"The very man of all others who has the deepest interest in a sound currency and who suffers most by mischievous legislation in money matters is the man who earns his daily bread by his daily toil."

These words are as pertinent now as on the day they were uttered, and ought to impressively remind us that a failure in the discharge of our duty at this time must especially injure those of our countrymen who labor and who because of their number and condition are entitled to the most watchful care of their government.

Mr. KELLER. What is the date of that?

Mr. REED of New York. August 8, 1893. Quoting further:

Our country's indebtedness, whether owing by the Government or existing between individuals, has been contracted with reference to our present standard. To decree by act of Congress that these debts shall be payable in less valuable dollars than those within the contemplation and intention of the parties when contracted would operate to transfer by the fiat of law and without compensation an amount of property and a volume of rights and interests almost incalculable.

Every dollar of fixed and stable value has through the agency of confident credit an astonishing capacity of multiplying itself in financial work. Every unstable and fluctuating dollar fails as a basis of credit, and in its use begets gambling speculation and undermines the foundations of honest enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to impress upon Members here and now that we have been experimenting with the currency, and we know that unemployment today is largely caused by the fact that the industries engaged in the manufacture of durable goods cannot get any credit at all. Credit in this country is practically dried up. No matter how much credit is available, people do not dare use it. All the time that this unsound legislation is held up here before the people of the United States we are retarding recovery. Other nations are going forward. They have fortified their currencies by balancing their budgets. They are manufacturing and selling in the world's markets, but our people are living under a cloud of fear at the present time because of legislation of this character.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What countries have stabilized their currency recently?

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BAKEWELL].

Mr. BAKEWELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this bill. Not long ago we put through the House a bill 60 pages long whose ostensible object was to regulate the stock exchanges, but whose concealed object was to regiment all industry. This was put through after a debate of 7 hours. The committee had been laboring for 7 weeks, and at the end of 7 weeks they could not understand the bill; they could not agree as to what the bill meant. The present bill is not quite so bad. It is 12 pages long instead of 60, but it also is involved with clauses within clauses, and sentences so intertwined that they are like the yews of Borrowdale, "upcoiling and inveterately convolved."

What does this bill mean? Does it compel the President to proceed with dispatch toward this goal that you have set? Not at all. It only sets as the ultimate objective the establishment of the ratio of 25 to 75 as between silver and gold. The original proposal called for the purchase of 50,000,000 ounces per month. This the President opposed, and it was taken from the bill. The ultimate objective cannot be obtained until we have, according to the figures given, 1,700,000,000 ounces, so that even if we purchased 50,000,000 ounces a month, it would require about 3 years to reach the objective at which this measure aims.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I have not the time.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But I do not think the gentleman wants to make a misstatement of fact. He says to this House that in the bill considered by the Ways and Means Committee there was provided the purchase of 50,000,000 ounces of silver per month.

Mr. BAKEWELL. I am speaking of the bill as reported to the Senate, and I am referring to the statement of the gentleman in the Senate who was its proponent, that that was the original proposal, and that the President disapproved of it, and that consequently it was made permissive instead of mandatory. Senator PITTMAN said:

The President yielded with regard to the mandatory provision about purchasing silver until he got 25 percent of the reserves, and we yielded on the point that he should not be required to purchase 50,000,000 ounces a month, or any other particular amount.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But it was not in this bill.

Mr. BAKEWELL. I am talking about the original proposal, and I refuse to yield further.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is not correct in his statement.

Mr. BAKEWELL. I am correct in my statement that that was in the original bill.

So that this bill is again ambiguous in its purpose and in what it actually calls for. The President can take as much time as he pleases, and no one knows when, if ever, this objective may be reached. But suppose it were reached, who are to be the beneficiaries? It is put forward as an obvious purpose that this bill is intended to help the farmer. We are all interested in the farmer. The farmer's conflict with Wall Street goes way back in history, even unto the days of Cain and Abel. Now, Cain was a farmer; he earned his living by tilling the soil, working from dawn until dark, and by the sweat of his brow trying to wrest a living from a reluctant earth. As he looked up and saw brother Abel reclining under the cool shade of a cypress tree, idly watching his sheep, occasionally going out to fleece them, and once in a while leading a little lamb to the slaughter, he was angered against this precursor of Wall Street, and he rose up in his might and smote him, even unto death. Now, Cain had no intention of killing Abel. He just wanted to make him realize what the hard knocks of life meant, but he overdid it. You gentlemen who represent the farming interests of the West do not mean to kill Wall Street; but that may, unfortunately, be the result.

Many changes have come to the farming industry since the pioneer days of Cain. Increase in agricultural knowledge and the perfecting of the instruments of farming brought such improvement that by the time we reach the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, especially in England and America, the farmer was as happy and contented as any man. It was on the farm, more than anywhere else, that were developed the homely virtues of honesty, thrift, industry, and self-reliance; it was on the farm that was established the principle that a man's home is his castle. The farm was, in fact, for the modern world the cradle of liberty. The sturdy men and women who made America were farm bred. The farmer's life was indeed hard, and he had to endure lean years, but such was his independence of spirit that he bore his burdens bravely and did not run as a beggar to the seat of government to ask for help. A new conception of the farm came with the development of the West, with its huge ranches devoted to the raising of a single crop. This was big business, although the product might be wheat instead of automobiles. Overproduction resulted, and here the trouble began which the various measures introduced in this Congress have attempted to alleviate. Our Eastern farmer, with his subsistence homestead, has not been helped in the least by any of these measures. I know, of course, that there are many farms in the West run on a subsistence basis, where the old values of independence and self-reliance are still cherished. But the owners of these farms are not the ones who are begging help of the Federal Government. They desire rather to be let alone and to work out their own salvation.

But, in truth, this bill will not help any of the farmers, big or little. It will prove as futile as the effort to raise the price of pork by slaughtering millions of pigs, or to raise the price of beef by slaughtering hundreds of thousands of cattle, or the effort to improve the condition of the farmers of the West and the planters of the South by bribing them to reduce their acreage.

As a matter of fact, what this bill really proposes, and the real motive behind it, is simply the desire to subsidize silver, to raise the value of silver, partly to help the silver-producing States, but also to help all these speculators and hoarders who have been accumulating silver. It will not help anyone else.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. I should like to ask the gentleman's opinion if this bill really makes silver primary money or whether it still leaves it as token money?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I think it still leaves it as token money.

Mr. Speaker, we have on various occasions in our history tried, by legislation, to raise the value of silver. I want to read two or three words from a very wise Democrat, Grover Cleveland, who throughout the land is still held in honor as one of the great men of our country, although the gentlemen on the left side of the House today are inclined to criticize and condemn him as an instrument of Wall Street. It is a popular fashion nowadays, when in trouble, to seek some personal devil whom we can blame for our difficulties. So you gentlemen, many of you, have made a personal devil of Wall Street and have managed to conjure up a number of names of prominent men, most of which happen to begin with the letter "M", to swell the number of the devil's minions. Some of you are inclined to include this great Democrat among them. This is what President Cleveland wrote:

> At times like the present, when the evils of unsound finance threaten us, the speculator may anticipate a harvest gathered from the misfortune of others, the capitalist may protect himself by hoarding or may even find profit in the fluctuations of values; but the wage earner—the first to be injured by a depreciated currency and the last to receive the benefit of its correction—is practically defenseless. He relies for work upon the ventures of confident and contented capital. This failing him, his condition is without alleviation, for he can neither prey on the misfortunes of others nor hoard his labor.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I yield.

Mr. FORD. We had that quotation about 5 minutes ago. Is the gentleman going to fill the RECORD with it?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I am repeating it deliberately. Apparently repetition is necessary, for his words of wisdom are so quickly forgotten by the men on the gentleman's side of the aisle.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. I have great respect for the gentleman's opinion. I understand the gentleman has been professor at Yale University. I want to ask this question: Does the gentleman not think this bill will get us into the same situation, if we go back to gold redemption, as happened during the time of President Cleveland?

Mr. BAKEWELL. Possibly; but I am not sure that I get the gentleman's meaning.

The purchase of silver at artificial prices will not help recovery, but will definitely retard it by further undermining the confidence of our people in the currency of our country. There will be no recovery, no sound recovery, until normal business functions, until normal business activities are allowed to thrive and prosper. One thing that is most essential to bring about this result is the restoration of confidence. Without that we cannot go forward. This bill will neither help the farmer nor the manufacturer nor the laboring man, nor will it further international commerce. The sole beneficiaries will be the speculators in silver, and the silver-producing States.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BAKEWELL. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman called attention again to the fact of the repeal of the silver law under Grover Cleveland. I should like to have the gentleman tell us whether that took us out of that great depression or not.

Mr. BAKEWELL. The repeal of the silver act did not immediately get us out but it started us on our way. If it had not been repealed, we should have remained in the depression much longer. We moved forward slowly but surely, much aided by the courageous and uncompromising attitude of President Cleveland. I could wish that our present President had been equally firm and unyielding in his opposition to silver legislation.

I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back 3 minutes.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] the remainder of the time, 5 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that most Members of the House will approach this question of silver in much the same attitude as I shall, namely, what it will do or not do for the country generally and particularly for the people in my district; and when I say people, I mean the farmers, the business men, and labor.

I do not pretend to know a great deal about silver. When experts, who have spent a lifetime of study on this matter, are in hopeless disagreement, it is quite natural that Members of Congress, who can make but a casual study of the problem, should also disagree on this or any other silver measure.

Certain it is that people are not so gullible about the fancied benefits of silver legislation as they were in 1896. The press and the radio have helped to dispel some of the delusions together with the enlarged understanding of the people. Back in 1896—the days of Populism—when Bryan's star was in the ascendancy, the father of 17 sons took his family for a visit with the Governor of a silver Western State. The Governor appraised the family and said, "Well, John, I suppose your fine family of sons are all good Populists and all for free silver."

"All except one", replied the father.

"Which one?" asked the Governor.

The father said, "That little runty feller there in the corner."

"And what's the matter with him?" asked the Governor.

"Waal", drawled the father, "That little critter has learned to read."

Now, without any reflection on the proponents of this or any other silver legislation, I may say that more people are opposed to silver as they learn to read more about its vagaries and its fancied remedial qualities.

I approach it, therefore, in a common-sense way, and I trust that my vote on this measure may be dictated by sincere convictions, founded on substantial reasons.

I voted for the original Dies bill, which sought outlet for our farm products by authorizing the acceptance of silver in payment therefor, even though we had to accept the silver at a premium over the world price of silver. We at least got the benefit of the sale before we could have an inflation. In the present bill, which Mr. DIES has introduced, we get inflation first, and the illusory hope that we might get some world business afterward.

The bill seeks to fix a ratio of one to three for silver, and to effect that ratio authorizes the Treasury to buy silver at reasonable prices, but not to exceed 50 cents an ounce for domestic silver and not to exceed the monetary price for any other. The monetary price is $1.29 per ounce. Silver certificates shall be issued against the cost of the silver so acquired. If we require about one and one-third billion ounces to establish the 25-75 ratio, and it could all be purchased for 50 cents an ounce, it would require at least $650,000,000 of expenditure out of any available money for that purpose. By adding this amount or more to our present circulating medium, it constitutes inflation. If this silver were purchased at the price for newly mined silver under the Pittman proposal of last winter, namely 64½ cents, it would add even more; at the monetary price of $1.29, it would add still more.

This is not the first time that silver-purchase proposals have been advanced in this country. In 1878, under the Bland-Allison Act, from two to four million dollars worth of silver per month was purchased, and actually the total so purchased under that act amounted to more than $378,000,000. In 1890, under the Sherman Act, they authorized purchases up to four and one-half million ounces per month, and issued certificates redeemable in gold, as a result of which the first flurry in 1893 caused people to redeem silver certificates in gold, thereby depleting the Treasury of its gold reserve, and bringing on the depression of 1893.

What contentions are advanced in behalf of a measure such as this? It is argued that it will broaden the metallic base for our currency, raise prices, benefit the silver States, and promote world trade.

To be sure, it will broaden our currency base, but no conclusive argument has been advanced to show that that will help matters. Banks are filled with money, deposits in every State in the Union are mounting, billions of excess reserves are available as a base for expanding credit, but thus far that credit has not been jarred loose. It is the velocity and turnover of money, not the quantity that counts. You will, by the terms of this bill, add to the quantity of money, but you do not aid credit expansion, and the result will be that additional money will only find its way into deposits precisely as the rest of our circulating medium is now doing. The loans to small industry, the housing bill, and other measures are designed to stimulate credit. This bill gives no evidence that it can aid such credit expansion in the slightest way. What we need is not more money—we have more now than we ever had—but money that travels faster.

You say this bill will raise prices. That it will advance us toward the magic 1926 price level. Look at the committee report which accompanied the gold reserve bill which passed this House in January. There they made the same argument. The cry was devaluation, for a broader base, for higher prices. Did we get them? The fact is that on May 15 the general price index was lower than it was in February, and were it not for the drought, the farm-index level would be lower than it was before the Gold Reserve Act was passed. Meanwhile, because of codes, the spread between the price of farm products and manufactured products is widening rather than narrowing. The International News Service reported the President as stating early in May, after a conference with silver advocates that, "Experimentation with gold has been a flop. I have no hesitation now in experimenting with silver." I do not vouch for the truth of that statement, but it appeared on the front page of the Washington Herald, and if it is true, then we dare assume that this, too, will be experimentation, and experimentation breeds uncertainty.

The mining benefits of the bill will at best be limited and it is doubtful in the extreme whether we should pass legislation of this character, the benefits of which will be limited and the uncertainties of which may be wide-spread. Seven States, with an aggregate population less than that of the State of New Jersey, produce more than 90 percent of all the silver in the country. Since we are already obligated under the Pittman proposal for most of the newly mined silver at 64½ cents per ounce, I cannot discern the heralded benefits that are to accrue to the mining States.

The foreign-trade benefits recited under the provisions of this measure are illusory and quite doubtful. We watched and waited with bated breath when the Gold Reserve Act was passed in January for other nations to forsake gold and to devalue. They failed to do so. We waited for an increase in the movement of goods in foreign commerce. The increase was sadly disappointing. We started with an academic assumption and expected other nations to stand idly by in the battle of money and exchange while we increased our foreign trade. That was sheer stupidity.

Take Germany as an example. With only 7 percent of gold reserve behind the mark, and with the mark having a purchasing power of 40 cents in this country in May 1934 as compared with 25 cents in May of 1933, we felt certain that either Germany must buy from us or must devalue. She did neither. She established a system of conversion marks whereby every importer must first secure a half dozen approvals from a half dozen bureaus and then secure a supply of these special conversion marks before he could import from other countries. They established quotas and subsidies and so set at naught our most carefully calculated schemes. Argentina did precisely the same thing, and from all appearances our best-laid schemes of using money and exchange weapons with which to augment foreign trade failed to take into account the element of human nature.

What assurance is there that when through purchases the price of silver does go up that it will stimulate trade with India and China? As an academic proposal it should work out that way, but it does not. The people in India and China are already hoarding 7,000,000,000 of the 12,000,000,000 available ounces of silver in the world. What could be more natural than to hoard even more if the price goes up? What shall prevent them, with the connivance of the trained experts of other nations overseas, from setting up quotas, subsidies, and other obstructions and leave us with nothing more than a great domestic uncertainty that is inimical to recovery?

In the solitude for a fancied foreign trade we are ready to crucify labor, the farmer, and the business man. I am ready to support any measure conducive to recovery, but I shall oppose any measure which is so thoroughly speculative and so filled with uncertainties.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall consume the remainder of the time to my credit, but I want to say very briefly in reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio, whom I respect very highly, that I feel his statement that this is a gag rule, under all the circumstances, was not justified. If it had not been for a certain parliamentary situation which developed in the committee in reference to some amendment that had been proposed to the original bill, it would not have been necessary at all to secure a special rule for the consideration of the bill in the form in which it is now offered. It was clearly a technical problem that required the intervention of the Committee on Rules to bring in a rule in the form in which it is presented. It has none of the aspects of a gag rule. As I understand it, the strictures of the gentleman from Ohio along this line were based upon the fact that but 3 hours were allowed for general debate. I do not know that the Members would be able to reach a more intelligent conclusion upon this bill one way or the other if we had 6 months of general debate upon it. I am one of those who undertook for 2 or 3 years to make a very intensive study of the currency question and related economics. I spent many long hours after leaving my office, reading what I regarded as textbooks upon this question, books written by eminent authorities. After 2 or 3 years of study on this problem in an effort to reach some intelligent opinion, I finally concluded that nobody in this world knew much about the whole subject. [Applause.] It is too complicated, it has too many ramifications, there are too many opinions with respect to it, and the economists do not agree on it. I was somewhat surprised to see a former college economist speak on this question. We have heard a good many strictures from the other side upon members of the "brain trust", but I assume some of the Members on the other side respect the views of this solitary member of the "brain trust" on their side because formerly he was a college professor.

Mr. Speaker, we have had hearings with reference to the silver controversy for the last 2 or 3 years. The matter has been studied in a very intensive form. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures prepared a bill which passed the House, the Dies bill, and was sent to the other body. There was grave difference of opinion as to the efficacy of that bill.

It was the conclusion of the House committee charged with the responsibility to recommend legislation upon that question that this was the wisest bill that could be offered under the circumstances at this time. It went to the Senate and numerous conferences have been held by Senators and Representatives touching this question, and the matter now presented comes to us in the form of a compromise, as I understand it, with the approval of the administration.

I do not know, and no man knows, whether or not the passage of this bill, if it passes, will effectuate the desirable results that the sponsors hope it will accomplish. Here is a proposition presented to consider this measure upon its merits and the resolution simply provides for its consideration in order that we may register the will of the House of Representatives upon the question. It is an ordinary rule. I regret that more time could not be devoted to its discussion, but everyone here knows the legislative situation in which we are placed. There are many of us who want to conclude the program and adjourn this Congress, but we have certain things to do before we can expect to get away. If we had unlimited debate on this and other involved problems to come up, it would consume a vast amount of time.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact also that the tariff bill will be completed at an early date. Then they will probably take up the silver legislation in the Senate, and it is important that they have the House bill before them at that time. I think, therefore, that is an additional reason why this House ought to pass this bill within a reasonable time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. May I say, too, in connection with this matter, my function here as Chairman of the Committee on Rules is to present this rule and ask my associates on this side of the House to adopt the rule giving the legislative committee in charge of the responsibility of presenting the matter an opportunity to present the question on its merits. There are some Members on this side opposed to the provisions of the bill, but I trust that those Members will certainly support this rule, so that consideration may be given to the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the resolution by striking out the words "2 hours" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "3 hours."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: On page 1, line 9, strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FIESINGER) there were—ayes 106, noes 4.

So the previous question was ordered on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FIESINGER) there were—ayes 98, noes 1.

So the previous question was ordered on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FIESINGER) there were—ayes 95, noes 18.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 214, nays 71, not voting 145, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—DISBURSEMENTS BY THE WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENTS AND THE PANAMA CANAL (H.DOC. NO. 391)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered printed:

To the Congress:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 16 of the act of March 3, 1933 (ch. 212, 47 Stat. 1489, 1517), as amended by title III of the act of March 20, 1933 (ch. 3, 48 Stat. 8, 16), I am transmitting herewith an Executive order revoking section 4 of Executive Order No. 6166 of June 10, 1933, insofar as and to the extent that it is applicable to the disbursing functions under the jurisdiction of the War Department, the Navy Department (including the Marine Corps), and the Panama Canal, except those pertaining to departmental salaries and expenses in the District of Columbia.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 29, 1934.

SILVER

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MARTIN of Colorado in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, just 1 year ago the Congress declared the gold contract clause against public policy, thereby relieving a hundred billions of dollars of debt from the burden of the impossibility of gold payment.

Today, by the passage of the Dies bill, we make possible the addition of more than a thousand millions of dollars of silver to our national monetary supply.

I read from yesterday's New York Times:

> Silver receipts at the mints rose to 885,056 fine ounces in the week ended May 25, exceeding by about 200,000 ounces the total of any previous week.

This is a very important statement at this time, as I view it. This sounds like a lot of silver, but if purchases should rise to a million ounces a week it would take 1,300 weeks, or more than 24 years, to buy the amount of silver the Treasurer is directed and authorized to purchase under this bill.

Ever since silver was demonetized in 1873, there have been many efforts to rehabilitate and remonetize it—the Bland-Allison Act of 1878 and the Sherman Act of 1890 are examples. Since the repeal of the Sherman Act in 1893, there has been no prospect of success for the remonetization of silver until this hour.

The Dies bill, as reported by the Ways and Means Committee, authorizes the addition of more than a billion dollars of silver to our basic money supply. The silver certificates to be issued under the bill are full legal tender for all debts both public and private, and in the language of the market place are "just as good as gold." The actual results will be the same as though a billion of gold certificates were added to our circulating medium. Our silver currency is just as good as gold. Yes; better than gold, for you can still get silver dollars for your silver certificates, but no gold for any kind of currency.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to increase his supply of monetary silver to one-fourth that of the total monetary stock in the Treasury. At the last report there was seven billions seven hundred and fifty-five millions of monetary gold in the United States Treasury. The stock of monetary silver was $392,000,000. Therefore our present total monetary stock of gold and silver is eight billions four hundred and forty-seven millions of money. Twenty-five percent of this huge sum is two billions two hundred millions. Since the amount of silver on hand is only $892,000,000, to raise the silver holdings to two billions two hundred millions will require the purchase of at least 1,300,000,000 additional ounces of silver.

The estimated free silver in the world that might possibly be acquired is 750,000,000 ounces. It will at once be seen that the policy which the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to carry out will lift silver up to its former place beside gold and increase tremendously our base of metallic money. It will expand our volume of actual money by the very soundest possible monetary policy. Every dollar of currency issue will be backed up by an actual dollar of noble metal, either in coin or bullion, that can be coined when coin is demanded.

The Dies bill meets completely the pledge of the Democratic platform to maintain a sound currency at all hazards. There is no fiat or doubtful promise to pay in the money authorized to be issued under the terms of this bill. It loads no additional debt upon the Federal Government and creates no doubt as to its soundness under any conditions. We are at present struggling with a desperate economic problem. Debt, both public and private, is at the bottom of all of our economic troubles. If we want to avoid a recurrence of the collapse of 1929, we should avoid money based upon governmental fiat as we would a pestilence. I read the other day where a Member of this House said "a man might just as well be in hell as in debt." If he is in debt and cannot pay it, he is in hades already.

By the repeal of the gold-payment clause and the declaration that all our money is legal tender in discharge of debt, either public or private, approved in May 1933 we made the first step making it possible to restore silver to its former place beside gold as primary money. By the enactment of the bill now under consideration we are saying to the world, "Silver is money", and the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is directed to maintain it as an integral part of the monetary system of the Nation. With the equality of silver established and restored, our monetary system will rest upon the very broadest possible base. There will be a sufficient volume of money to supply the lifeblood of trade, which is sound credit, and to build our future prosperity upon the best financial system in the world.

The new freedom of the new-deal monetary policy was first stated in the gold-payment repeal bill, as follows:

> That every provision contained in or made with respect to any obligation which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency or in amount in money of the United States measured thereby is declared to be against public policy.

That is the new Declaration of Independence under the new deal that lifted an intolerable burden of debt from the backs of the American people.

For 40 years I have advocated a bimetallic monetary system providing for unlimited coinage of gold and silver at a ratio fixed by law. The silver and gold so coined to be legal tender for all debts, both public and private, and the United States Treasury authorized to pay in either standard gold or silver dollars at its option.

On January 3, 1934, at the beginning of this session, I introduced a bill which provided:

> SEC. 2. The dollar shall consist of 12.9 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, or of 412½ grains of silver nine-tenths fine, and shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity.
> SEC. 3. Gold and silver dollars of the standard weight and fineness provided in this act shall be legal tender for the payment of all debts, both public and private, and the United States Treasury may pay the obligations of the Federal Government in either standard gold or silver dollars at its option.

The parity under the Dies bill is 27 to 1, while the parity under my bill would be 32 to 1, or practically the same thing. It will be readily seen that the provisions of this bill are practically the same as those contained in the bill which we are now about to enact into law.

If these provisions could be submitted to a popular vote of the American people at the next general election, they would be approved by an overwhelming majority of the voters of this Nation.

The Dies bill comes nearest to meeting these provisions of any measure that will be considered by this Congress. This act will put silver on a practical parity with gold and the money issued under its provisions will be full legal tender for all debts, both public and private.

This bill is a fundamental part of the President's monetary program. It is an integral part of the new deal for national recovery. It is the beginning of a new dawn for American agriculture and American industry. It will be a powerful factor in the restoration of our foreign trade. The silver-using nations will be quick to use their money or silver in purchase of our surplus products. Commodity prices will rise as the volume of money in circulation increases. The debtor will liquidate his debts with these new-deal dollars rather than liquidate through bankruptcy or repudiation, as under the old deal.

The people expect this legislation, the times demand it, and the Congress should give it immediate and overwhelming approval.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I yield if I have any further time.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman from Nebraska does not contend for a moment that the Dies bill now being considered remonetizes silver in any respect?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. It certainly does. It remonetizes silver to the extent the silver we buy is to be made an actual part of the monetary system of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. PARSONS. But it does not in any wise mention any ratio or provide for the maintenance of any ratio.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee. This bill is not what it is labeled by its sponsors, a bill to establish bimetallism. It is a racket, and do not fool yourselves for one minute, and do not get the idea that the people of the United States are not going to be wise to that racket.

When we took the gold into the Federal Treasury, we prevented anybody getting any profit on it who had gold in the United States. By the terms of this bill we hand to these racketeers, these speculators who have been in the market buying silver, a 50-percent profit.

I am going to find out whether you mean this to be a half-way honest bill when you get to the point, because I am going to offer an amendment which taxes the profits of the speculators 100 percent.

Mr. WHITE. Nobody profited by the devaluation of gold.

Mr. TABER. Those who shipped gold out of the country did.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Knowing the gentleman as I do, I cannot think for a moment that he means that anyone who votes against his amendment to tax the profit 100 percent would be dishonest.

Mr. TABER. Either they do not understand the situation or they are participators in the racket.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I know the gentleman would not profess to be the only honest man in the House.

Mr. TABER. No; I have stated the situation that exists, and that cannot be disputed.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. The thought that disturbs me is that if you take all the profit away we have no way to compel the people to sell their silver to the Government except under the clause where they will get 65 cents.

Mr. TABER. The Government is paying 64, and the price of silver is 45, so that the Government pays 20 cents more. I cannot understand how that can be unless there is a racket, and I cannot approve of that kind of doings.

Now, let me give you a few of those who will be benefited by this proposition.

Now, among the big holders—and, frankly, it has been the policy of this administration to favor the big interests right along. Here are some of them. See how you like it.

Chase National Bank, 18,000,000 ounces; the National City Bank, 7,500,000 ounces; E. L. Cord, 1,750,000 ounces; Goldman Sachs, 3,000,000 ounces; Interstate Equity, 1,500,000 ounces; Texas Corporation, 1,180,000 ounces; Marine Midland Bank & Trust Co., 1,250,000 ounces.

The Eastman Kodak Co., 12,000,000 ounces; Public National Bank, New York, 350,000,000 ounces.

That is a part of the group of speculators. You know that you have restricted the speculation in stocks. Therefore, folks have taken to speculating in metal, and the object of this bill, and a lot of those people back of it, is to boost the price of silver for the benefit of those speculators, and they are the ones who are going to reap.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. What does the gentleman think about this bill establishing three prices for silver? We are paying 64½ cents an ounce for newly mined silver, and it is proposed under the bill to pay 50 cents an ounce as of record May 1, and then we propose when we nationalize silver to pay another price, which may be set by the Secretary of the Treasury. I want someone during the course of this debate to explain why we should have three prices of silver.

Mr. TABER. No one can explain it satisfactorily.

Of course there is no such thing as currency expansion under this bill. The other feature of this bill is this: We buy silver from foreign countries, and we pile something up in the Treasury of the United States that nobody else wants and that everybody is glad to shove onto us, and we get ourselves in just the same position that we got into between 1920 and 1929, when we sold our goods to foreign countries and took back South American and European bonds. It is just the same process. Are we going to do it again, or are we going to learn a little something by experience?

Mr. PARSONS. Under the terms of this bill, what will we buy foreign silver with?

Mr. TABER. American currency, probably, and American currency will be represented by American goods that go over to foreign countries.

Mr. PARSONS. We are not going to send any currency over to a foreign land to buy silver.

Mr. TABER. The currency will be paid by the Treasury for the silver when it comes back here. The silver at first will go to the producers of the merchandise that we send across the water, and then the operation will result not in an increase in the paper which is in circulation but an increase in silver paper in circulation and a decrease in Federal Reserve bank notes, and when you get all through the operation you will not have increased your currency circulation at all.

Mr. PARSONS. How many million ounces of silver does the gentleman think we might get from abroad under this act?

Mr. TABER. No one can tell. You will see all sorts of statistics. Some people say 450,000,000 and some people go a good deal higher than that. Of course, silver in foreign countries cannot be estimated anywhere as near accurately as silver in the United States.

Mr. PARSONS. How many ounces will we get in the United States under this act?

Mr. TABER. I do not know, and no one knows, but the program would evidently be to get it. I understand that a lot of those countries have a great deal more than they need, and that they would be glad to get it over here, get it out of their market. It is something they do not want.

Mr. PARSONS. That is, they do not want it if it is going to remain cheap, but if it is going to get to the coinage price of $1.29 or higher, would not these foreign countries hold their silver, expecting the higher price, or a world-wide remonetization. Would they send silver to this country if there was anything that would boost the price of silver to the coinage price?

Mr. TABER. Oh, the natural operation, of course, would be that they would not. We may be sure that if there is any international deal, if experience of the past is anything to go by, that Uncle Sam will get the worst of it. And we are surely going to get it if we pass this bill as it now stands.

Mr. PARSONS. Is there anything in this bill to provide for the enhancement of the price of silver to the coinage price of $1.29—any incentive?

Mr. TABER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, in looking over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, proceedings of the House, of May 2, 1933, when we had under consideration title III of Public Act No. 10, I can readily forecast what probably will happen with this measure now under consideration. Gentlemen will recall the discussion on that day last year. They will remember that the inflationists and those who are against inflation and were looking for a sop, so that inflation might not come, embraced title III of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and embraced it enthusiastically. Today history repeats itself with another measure of like character, perhaps not so far-reaching in its effect and importance as that passed last year but nevertheless in exactly the same category. Lest I be labeled as a "brain truster" or a professor, I hasten to admit that there is plenty that I do not know about silver and money; but there are some things that anyone with any degree of intelligence can understand, and you can understand this bill, if you read it. If you understand the history of silver in this country, you have every reason to expect that you will find exactly the same occurrences under the operations of this act as happened under the operations of the Silver Acts of 1890 and 1878. I have read a great deal on the question of silver in the past few weeks and I shall make reference now to two editorials, one appearing in a newspaper in my district, in the State of Wisconsin, and one appearing in the New York Times.

I will read just a portion of each of those editorials. First, from the Janesville Gazette of Janesville, Wis., entitled "The Silver Senators Win Their Battle":

President Roosevelt, after many statements opposing the silver program, has finally succumbed to the bloc backed by the Members of Congress from the silver-mining States. It is quite possible that the President was moved to this action by the belief that nothing could very seriously disturb the monetary situation of the United States. It is known that Mr. Roosevelt has been deeply disappointed over the refusal of commodities to respond to the gold policy and that devaluation did not carry out the Professor Warren guarantee that farm prices would jump equivalent to 41 percent when that percentage was cut from the circulation value of the gold dollar.

All the holders of silver who have been buying for speculation in anticipation of a legal national value of $1.29 an ounce as has been done, will profit heavily by this action. They will have a market for a dead product. As it is, there is an element of control in this understanding by which the Government becomes a dealer in silver—silver cannot be higher than $1.29 an ounce. It will mean the adding of about $1,500,000,000 to the frozen, cold storage, metal money of the country. The silver will not be circulated. It will be in the same position it has been before—issuance of silver certificates against the bullion in the Treasury.

There is no reason for alarm over the action. Our present difficulty is in frozen money. Gold is in the ice chest. Silver will be there along with the gold. The great need we have is not more volume of money but more money under full speed—money in the form of checks and other circulation media rather than more actual cash. Silver will make no difference in the supply of gold since we will not be buying silver with gold.

Under the Bryan plan of 1896 we should have been in the market for silver, paying for the white metal in gold or its equivalent at 16 to 1. Now if we buy silver at 50 cents an ounce and put it into circulation at $1.29 an ounce as soon as this machinery is set up we can use the silver certificates to pay for silver at the market. If it were not for this fact the silver movement might be considered a dangerous monetary experiment. Under this plan as accepted by the President, there will be just another special privilege law which will give the mine owners and the silver speculators a sale for unmarketable metal.

Let me refer to the editorial appearing in the New York Times, referring directly to this bill:

THE SILVER BILL AND OTHERS

Whatever is to be the result of the President's silver message and of the formulated silver bill, it is already evident that the proposals actually please very few. Some members of the silver bloc recognize grudgingly that a concession has been made to them but intimate that they have not got what they wanted. In business circles no enthusiasm has been shown for the President's plan, even as an inflation hypodermic. Cotton and wheat, the price of which has often risen temporarily at the idea of silver legislation, have made no response; silver itself has lost ground on the market.

Probably the community at large is merely bewildered. It certainly received little enlightenment from the Presidential message, which contained a good deal of unsupported assertion. Not the slightest evidence has appeared on any hand that the silver agitation, which in 1896 and 1878 stirred whole communities into intense political excitement, has reappeared. If one may judge by the cabled comments, the President's statement "that at no time since 1878 have conditions been more favorable for international agreement on a mixed-money standard" causes only skepticism abroad.

In some respects the present episode has repeated similar past experience at Washington. It is a manifest attempt at political compromise, and in this strongly resembles the ill-fated Silver Purchase Act of the Harrison administration in 1890. That, too, was an era of political dissatisfaction and of rash political experiment; the White House then favored "doing something for silver", because it found that only thus could it insure passage of a higher tariff. It resembles the equally celebrated Silver Coinage Act of 1878 in that large-scale compulsory purchase of silver was on that occasion conceded with the purpose of heading off a congressional demand for outright free coinage of silver with a resultant unlimited increase in the currency.

Both of these older compromise silver acts worked badly. Both resulted eventually in business reaction. Both were abandoned afterward; none of the benefits promised to the American business situation were realized. The Monetary Commission calculated in 1898 from the Treasury's statistics that the silver bought by the Government under the act of 1878 cost $308,279,000 and that purchases under the act of 1890 cost $155,931,000, which, with cost of transportation, footed up $465,274,000, whereas the market value of the silver thus acquired was $266,769,000 at the end of 1897, indicating loss on the unsuccessful operations of more than 42 percent.

It is doubtless true that loss or waste of public money, in amounts vastly beyond the modest calculations of the nineties, has no such effect nowadays on the public mind as it used to have.

Mr. CROSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield.

Mr. CROSS. Does the gentleman recognize the difference between the Sherman Act and the Allison Act and this bill where, under those acts, silver was held purely as a commodity, like so much wheat or corn, whereas under this bill it is made monetary metal and becomes a part of the monetary reserve of the country?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I recognize the distinction.

Mr. CROSS. Does the gentleman realize the fact that as long as silver was held as money in this country, the silver dollar was at a premium over the gold dollar?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Oh, I recognize the distinction. Perhaps this language from the same editorial sums it up:

Or is it perhaps that our public officials, if not the general public, have come to believe, as they did in 1929, that we are living now in a new era, in which old-time economic rule and precedent no longer apply?

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I cannot yield further.

May I say to you that I regard this act as just another sop, just some more tinkering with the monetary situation of the United States, with no particular historical reference or any other relationship to the international monetary system, and that the longer we continue in this country to tinker with our monetary policies, to tinker with gold and silver, the longer we will remain in the throes of this depression, because this act, along with many others which you are proposing at this session of Congress, only adds to the uncertainty of the situation.

In a previous speech I made on the results of this kind of legislation I said there is nothing that strikes terror to the mind of the average citizen more than uncertainty and doubt and fear of the future. Security is the finest insurance there is for a contented people. Business is no different from individuals. There can be no recovery until conditions are restored to some degree of normalcy, but you will never attain that goal until you quit tinkering and let people understand that we are on the road to stability. This measure just adds to the uncertainty; it will well serve speculators and no one else. It will just be labeled as another experiment designed to stop the demand for more comprehensive silver legislation, and will cost the American people millions upon millions of dollars.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MARTIN of Colorado). The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixteen Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, owing to the limited time allotted to me, I must necessarily confine discussion of my bill, H.R. 9745, to the general purposes and principal provisions of the bill. It has been my privilege to address the House upon the money subject on a number of occasions; and last Saturday, when my bill was being considered by the Ways and Means Committee, it was my happy privilege to discuss this bill and the money question in general for about 5 hours. I wish to express my deep appreciation for the kind hearing which the committee accorded me, the keen interest which they manifested in the subject, and the generous compliments which they so kindly paid me.

I wish to discuss briefly the history of silver legislation during this session of Congress.

THE DIES FARM-SILVER BILL

As is well known, my bill (H.R. 7581) passed the House on March 19, by a vote of 258 to 112. This bill provides for the exchange of American agricultural products for silver. Under its terms the Export-Import Bank of Washington, all agricultural marketing associations, and every private exporter are empowered to sell our surplus products abroad and to accept silver in payment therefor at a premium which shall be not less than 10 percent nor more than 25 percent above the world market price of silver. By utilizing the services of all established and recognized export agencies, whether governmental, cooperative, or purely private, we felt assured that the maximum of surplus products would be disposed of under the operation of the bill. The general purposes of that bill were to dispose of our surplus products abroad in a normal and constructive way, retain our dominant position in the export markets of the world, put a safe quantity of new and honest money into circulation, and thereby increase the purchasing power of the millions of producers of America who form the backbone of our economic life.

Against the silver received in payment for our surplus products, the bill provided that legal-tender certificates would be issued based upon the value at which the silver was accepted, and with these silver certificates the producers would be paid for their products. When this bill went to the Senate, it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. This committee, after extended hearings, submitted some very important and far-reaching amendments to my original bill and then reported favorably the amended bill to the Senate. My bill, as amended, was not acceptable to the administration, and there began a series of conferences between Members of the Senate and Members of the House and the President and Secretary of the Treasury designed to effect some compromise on the silver question that would be acceptable to all sides. I conferred with the Secretary of the Treasury and his assistants with a view of reaching some satisfactory settlement on this question, because I realized that without the approval of the administration it would be very difficult to enact silver legislation this session of Congress. As a result of these conferences with the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, my bill, which is being considered by the House today, was agreed upon. It can be truthfully said that the passage of my original bill by the House on March 19 by a majority of 258 to 112 was responsible for silver legislation during this session of Congress. On May 22 Senator PITTMAN in a speech said:

I may say that the foundation for this message and for this proposed legislation might be called the "Dies bill", which came over from the House, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, reported out of this body, and is now on the calendar.

It is well to remember in connection with this matter that my original silver bill was the first one to pass either branch of Congress since 1893, and to the action of the House in passing this bill so overwhelmingly must be ascribed the success of the silver movement during this session of Congress.

DIES SILVER PURCHASE ACT OF 1934

As previously stated, this bill, which I introduced on May 23, represents the limit to which the President is willing to go in the remonetization of silver. The bill is partly mandatory and partly discretionary. Section 2, which declares it to be the policy of the United States that the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary stocks of the United States will be increased, with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining one fourth of the monetary value of such stocks in silver, is clearly mandatory. So is section 3, which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, at home or abroad, for present or future delivery, so long as the proportion of silver in the stocks of gold and silver of the United States is less than one-fourth of the monetary value of such stock, unquestionably mandatory. Section 5 of the bill, which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to issue silver certificates in such denominations as he may from time to time prescribe in a face amount not less than the cost of all silver purchased under the authority of section 3, is also mandatory. While the command to increase the stock of silver to the required proportion and to purchase silver, at home or abroad, until this ratio is reached are mandatory, the Secretary of the Treasury is given discretion to purchase such silver, at such rates, at such times, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest. This bill is more than an authorization: it is a command from Congress to the Secretary of the Treasury to achieve the ultimate objective of the bill as soon as possible consistent with the public welfare.

Assuming that the administration will use every effort to carry out the purposes of the bill and to achieve the principal objective contained therein, as we have every reason to believe, it is wiser to leave to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury the times and quantity of purchase rather than to compel the Secretary of the Treasury by mandatory requirement to purchase a given quantity of silver each month regardless of conditions and circumstances which may arise. It was urged, and not without reason, that to require the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a given quantity of silver each month would put the Government at the mercy of the speculators.

GENERAL PURPOSES OF THE BILL

The bill is designed to increase the world price of silver. This increase should not be sudden or precipitate. It should be brought about gradually and in a way that will not disrupt the price level of silver-using countries. China is on a silver standard. As the price of silver fell during the past few years, commodity prices rose in China. The depreciation of silver currency in China produced inflation. While commodity prices and property values fell in gold-standard countries on account of the increased purchasing power of gold, the reverse was true in China. Gold-standard countries suffered from the disadvantages of deflation while silver-using countries enjoyed the advantages of inflation. If we were to announce to the world tomorrow that the Government of the United States intended to purchase 1,500,000,000 ounces of silver at the world market price, and that we would stay in the market and continue to purchase silver until that limit was reached, the price of silver would suddenly increase to $1.29 an ounce. As the price of silver suddenly rose in China, commodity prices and property values there would crash, and China would have to go through the painful and disastrous experiences of deflation. We must remember that China is an importer of silver, and that she sells her exportable surplus to purchase silver. If the world price of silver were to rise suddenly, and if this rise was not accompanied by an increase in the gold prices of other commodities, China would naturally purchase less silver and more of other commodities.

LOW PRICE OF SILVER INJURIOUS TO OUR TRADE

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, the low price of silver is equally undesirable. On account of the depreciation of silver currency in China, and the silver-using countries in general, they are able to sell their exportable surpluses on the markets of the world at such a low price that we cannot compete with them. On account of her depreciated currency, Japan is flooding the markets of the world with her cheap products. British financial interests are able to buy huge quantities of silver at a low price, transfer the silver to China, and build and operate factories and industries at a very low cost. The Chinese dollar, although having only 25 cents of silver in it, will buy just as much in China with the world market price of silver at 25 cents an ounce as it will when silver reaches $1.29 an ounce. The same is true of other silver-using countries. This is not true, however, when the Chinamen want to purchase the products of gold-standard countries, such as the United States, since we, as well as all other gold-standard countries, do not recognize silver in payment for our surplus products. The Chinaman must first convert his silver into gold dollars. This makes it necessary for him to trade four or five silver dollars for one of our gold dollars. Therefore an automobile which costs $600 in the United States will cost the Chinaman $3,000, and in the process of exchange silver-using countries find that our products cost so much that they are unable to purchase them. Although India is not a strictly silver-standard country or a gold-standard country, a great part of her capital and purchasing power consist of silver. In China and India there are probably 7,000,000,000 ounces of silver, which represents the storehouse of value and the capital of millions of people. With silver at the low price which now prevails the owners of this vast stock of silver are unable to purchase the surplus products of other countries and especially our own.

When the price of silver rises, however, the purchasing power of these teeming millions will be restored. This will make it possible for them to purchase our surplus products, and a rise in the world price of silver is necessary to stimulate our foreign trade. In view of the tariff barriers erected by all gold standard countries and in view of the tremendous indebtedness that Europe owes America, it is improbable that in our time and generation we shall be able to regain or recapture our former trade with Europe. We must, therefore, look to Mexico, Canada, South America, and the hundreds of millions of people in the silver-using countries of the East for our future trade.

INCREASE IN SILVER PRICE WILL IMPROVE TRADE

Not only will the restoration of the normal purchasing power of silver open to us the tremendous possibilities of trade with silver-using countries, but also a purchase of silver in countries normally on a gold standard will stimulate the purchase of our surplus products. When we purchase foreign silver with our currency, those who get the currency can use it only for purchasing our surplus products, paying debts, or making capital investments in the United States. The bill will, therefore, operate indirectly in much the same as the Dies farm silver bill proposed to operate directly. Under that bill we proposed to exchange directly farm products for silver, deposit silver in the Treasury, and issue legal tender certificates against the silver with which to pay the American producers. If this bill is carried out according to its purposes and intent, the same result will be accomplished indirectly. In other words, if we purchased a billion dollars' worth of foreign silver and pay the holders of that silver with our paper currency, those to whom this paper currency is delivered can only use it by spending the money in the United States. In the original silver bill, H.R. 14374, which I introduced on January 23, 1933, and on which hearings were had, it was proposed to purchase silver very much in the same manner as this bill provides. Therefore, the practical effect of the purchase of foreign silver with paper currency is in many respects similar to my original plan which passed the House and which provided for direct barter. The difference is that under the Dies farm silver bill the holders of foreign silver would have to take agricultural surplus for their silver, whereas under this bill the holders of the paper currency can buy anything that they want to in the United States.

RESTORE NORMAL PURCHASING POWER OF THE DOLLAR

Not only will this bill, if it is put in operation, stimulate our sales to foreign countries and open to us the markets of the East but it will tend to restore the normal purchasing power of the dollar and stabilize it. As is well known, the purchasing power of the dollar between 1920 and 1929 was about 60 cents. From 1929 the purchasing power of our dollar, as measured in terms of 800 commodities, increased to $1.66. The reason why the purchasing power of our dollar was so comparatively low between 1920 and 1929 was because during this period there was no active demand for gold, and we inflated our credit dollars to the highest peak ever reached in our financial history. Practicall all the nations of the world went off the gold standard and suspended specie redemption. Much of this gold came to the United States in payment for surplus products which we sold to the belligerent nations. This decreased the demand for gold in the other nations of the world and increased the supply of gold in the United States. In obedience to the law of supply and demand gold fell in purchasing power, and our currency based upon that gold fell to a corresponding degree. But when the nations of the world began to resume specie redemption and to come back on the gold standard, there was a scramble for gold. This increased the demand for gold, and its purchasing power rose. During the period when gold had a low purchasing power, and when the dollar was worth about 60 cents in terms of commodities, we contracted in the United States about $250,000,000,000 of public and private indebtedness. Much of this indebtedness was payable in gold, and this, of course, increased the demand for the $4,500,000,000 of gold that we owned. The creditors loaned a 60-cent dollar.

However, after the 1929 crash the purchasing power of our dollar rose until it reached $1.66 in terms of commodities. This was due to the increase in the purchasing power of gold, brought about by the tremendous demand for gold and the colossal contraction of credit money in the United States. In this connection it is well to remember that money is any acceptable medium of exchange, and under this classification checks constitute money the same as currency, so long as the checks are good. Of course, checks are not as good as currency, because behind a check is the solvency of some banking institution, whereas behind our currency is the credit of the United States Government and also the gold and silver in the Treasury. In 1929 our bank deposits of about $60,000,000,000 turned over 22 times, and the volume of business as represented by check turn-overs was twelve hundred billions of dollars. After the crash of 1929 our bank deposits shrank nearly 50 percent, and the annual turnover decreased 50 percent. The volume of business as represented by check turn-overs shrank to $440,000,000,000. There was, therefore, a shrinkage in our medium of exchange of $960,000,000,000. This contraction of credit money, together with the appreciation in the purchasing power of gold, caused the purchasing power of our dollar to rise to unprecedented heights and commodity prices to fall to unparalleled depths. In addition to the stagnation of business produced by this and the unemployment and distress everywhere prevalent, the debtors, who had become very numerous, were required to pay back a dollar worth $1.66 for the 60-cent dollar which they received from their creditors in the beginning. This multiplied the staggering burden of public and private indebtedness threefold, until we were in a state of bankruptcy. Two courses were open to us. We could either proceed to liquidate through the courts, which meant bankruptcies, foreclosures, and untold suffering and hardships; or we could restore the normal purchasing power of the dollar as it existed between 1921 and 1929, when most of our debts were contracted. The majority of our people chose the latter course, and elected President Roosevelt upon this platform.

HOW WILL IT HELP RESTORE NORMAL PURCHASING POWER?

This bill will, therefore, contribute to the restoration of the 1926 price level, which is the average price level that existed between 1921 and 1929. How will it help to do this? First, by broadening our metallic base by the addition of nearly 1,500,000,000 ounces of silver to our present monetary stocks and the issuance of legal-tender currency against this silver. The addition of this silver to our present gold stocks will relieve the strain upon gold by decreasing the demand for gold as the basis for our currency and credit structure. To the extent that we decrease or diminish the demand upon gold and increase the supply of metallic money we will diminish the purchasing power of gold and our currency based upon it. Our money will be based on the average value of 2 commodities, gold and silver, rather than on the value of 1 commodity. When the two happen to be going in opposite directions, as they were in the eighties and nineties, the price level would be more stable than with a single commodity. The purchasing power of our currency would be more stable because it would not be dependent on accidental discoveries of a single commodity. The addition of a billion five hundred million ounces of silver to our monetary stocks would increase the metallic basis of currency so as to give the United States a monetary standard far less liable, than gold by itself, to severe and violent fluctuation in purchasing power. Under section 5 of the bill the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to issue silver certificates in such denominations as he may from time to time prescribe in a face amount not less than the cost of all silver purchased under the authority of section 3. In other words, if the Secretary of the Treasury purchases $500,000,000 of silver, he must issue $500,000,000 of new currency. He is also authorized to issue certificates based upon the monetary value of $1.29 an ounce.

If the Secretary acquires 2,000,000,000 ounces of silver, he could issue nearly $3,000,000,000 of new currency. This would certainly increase the volume of our currency to partly take the place of the shrinkage of credit money and the cash currency in hoarding or lost or abroad or in the banks. The fact that the holders of this currency so issued would have to spend it could increase the velocity of this $3,000,000,000 at least 10 times a year, which would mean a total business of $30,000,000,000 furnished by the new currency. This is much needed in view of the fact that of the $5,340,000,000 of outstanding currency nearly $3,000,000,000 of it is in hoarding or lost or abroad or in the tills of the banks.

BILL PROVIDES FOR SOUND MONEY

As I said, the issuance of this currency, which will be backed up by a metallic base as well as by the credit of the Government, will take the place of $3,000,000,000 of credit money, and this is very much needed. The banks of the country today have in excess of $3,000,000,000 of reserves with the Federal Reserve banks. These reserves do not constitute gold or silver or any metal having an intrinsic value; they merely constitute credit or book transactions. Against this reserve the banks could inflate credit tomorrow to the unprecedented heights of 106,000,000,000 credit dollars. If this were done, it would produce another crash compared with which the 1929 collapse would be insignificant. It is therefore wise to substitute a reasonable quantity of hard cash, backed up not only by the credit of the Government but also by metallic base for some of the phantom credit money which is like the "borealis race, which flits ere you can point its place, or, like the snowflake in the river, a moment white, then melts forever." Certainly a citizen would rather have a legal-tender silver certificate backed up by the credit of the Government and a sufficient quantity of silver in the Treasury in his pocket, in the bank, or as a reserve for his deposit than to have the phantom credit money which may disappear overnight. Now, I am not advocating that we relegate our elaborate credit machinery and substitute a cash economy in its place. I realize that a large part of our business will have to be conducted with credit money, but I am advocating a larger percentage of cash money, not only as a medium of exchange but also as a larger reserve for credit dollars.

Those who term the certificates under this act as unsound money forget that it was the Constitution that made silver just as much money as gold. They forget that the Federal Reserve bank notes issued under existing laws do not have either gold or silver behind them, and that prior to revaluation gold was only back of Federal Reserve notes to the extent of 40 percent of the face value of such notes. With silver at 64½ cents an ounce, these silver certificates will have more intrinsic metallic value behind them than the Federal Reserve notes had before revaluation and than any currency, with the exception of silver certificates, now has.

While I do not subscribe to the extreme view that the volume of money and the velocity of its turn-over absolutely control the price level, and while I believe that there are other important factors that enter into the determination of the price level, I certainly believe that cash and credit money and the velocity of turn-over of both are very important factors in the establishment and maintenance of the commodity price level and property values.

STABILIZATION FUND MUST BUY SILVER

There is another strong reason for the enactment of this bill. Not long ago we passed the gold revaluation bill. We embarked upon the policy of purchasing gold on the markets of the world at a premium in excess of 40 percent above the world-market price of gold. By bidding $15 an ounce more for gold than the statutory price of $20 plus per ounce, which had prevailed in this country as well as in the world at large for many decades, we depreciated the purchasing power of our currency in the foreign markets to the extent of 40 percent. In other words, we said that an ounce of gold was worth $35 in our paper money; therefore, those who wanted to purchase our surplus products could take an ounce of gold and for this ounce acquire $35 in our paper money. Since the price of our surplus products remained approximately the same, those who got $35 for our paper money for an ounce of gold, for which they could formerly get only $20 plus, were enabled to purchase 40 percent more of our surplus products with an ounce of gold than they previously could. By putting it different, they could buy our surplus products 40 percent cheaper.

This did not mean that the American exporter of the surplus received 40 percent less. He got the same thing for his products as he did before revaluation and he sold more products. Although our currency, in terms of gold, had 40 percent less purchasing power in the markets of the world, it had approximately the same purchasing power in the United States. Now, I am not criticizing the gold-revaluation policy. As a matter of fact, it stimulated our export trade in excess of 33⅓ percent. I introduced one of the first gold-revaluation bills in Congress and had a hearing on this bill nearly a year before the administration's gold-revaluation bill was passed by Congress. This important and far-reaching gold-revaluation bill was referred to the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee, upon which I have the honor to serve, and I supported the bill in the committee and on the floor of the House. In fact, I opened the debate in favor of the bill. But the failure of the Treasury to issue new currency based upon this increased value of our gold monetary stock deprived us of the full benefits of this act insofar as our internal price level is concerned. The inability to secure gold at any price on account of its scarcity and maldistribution limited the extent to which our export trade was stimulated. Under that bill we created a stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 for the purpose of stabilizing the purchasing power of our dollars on the markets of the world and restoring the normal purchasing power of our dollar as compared with other currencies. England had been operating the equalization fund for several years very successfully. By purchasing our dollars with this fund England was able to decrease the supply of our money and increase the demand for it, with the inevitable result that the purchasing power of our dollar rose very high in relation to other currency, and especially the English sterling. In this way England made our money dear and her money cheap and our money scarce and her money plentiful, with the result that the foreign buyers purchased the products of the British dominions and our export trade fell off tremendously.

In fact, our agricultural export trade fell from $1,800,000,000 in 1928 to four hundred millions last year, and we were being driven out of the markets of the world, and other nations with cheaper money were taking our place. Now, in order to keep our money from becoming too dear or too cheap we must either buy gold at a premium to force our dollar down or sell gold on the markets of the world to bring our dollar up, and if we do not buy gold we either have to buy silver or paper currencies of other nations. We cannot afford to buy paper currencies of other nations, because if we were to invest a billion dollars in the currencies of France, Italy, or England, they would probably depreciate those currencies, with the result that we would lose millions of dollars. We cannot buy gold, as I stated before, because of its scarcity and maldistribution. The gold supply of the world is locked up in the vaults of three nations, and no matter how much we bid for it, these nations are not going to let us have it. Besides, the more we buy the more we increase the maldistribution or dislocation of gold and aggravate world conditions. There is, therefore, only one other metal to purchase, and that is silver. While the total supply of gold in the world is limited to a billion ounces, and this supply is cornered by three nations, this is not true of silver. There are approximately 12,000,000,000 ounces of silver in the world, and it is fairly well distributed among the nations of the earth. Of course, the bulk of it is in China and India, but there are some four or five billion ounces in the rest of the world. Not only can we purchase silver with our paper currency and thereby make a success of our gold-revaluation policy, but we can purchase silver at the lowest price ever known in the history of the world, with the exception of a few months ago, when silver was only worth 25 cents an ounce. Not only can we purchase silver cheaply, due to the abnormally low price that prevails, but when we remove from the markets of the world a billion ounces of silver, the world price of silver will rise and we will make a tremendous profit.

The reactionary contends that there is too much silver in the world to raise its price by removing a billion ounces. Since Columbus discovered America there have been only 15,500,000,000 ounces of silver produced in the world, according to the report of the Federal Reserve Board and the Director of the Mint. Of this amount we can only locate about 9,400,000,000 ounces, and the most liberal estimate puts the amount of silver available for monetary uses at 12,000,000,000 ounces. While we cannot definitely say how much silver there is in the world, we can say that the statistics in regard to the production and consumption of silver are more accurate than with regard to gold. Gold was produced more easily in the early ages because it could be removed from gravel in the form of nuggets and dust, and by placer mining in various forms, even with a frying pan, whereas most of the silver is found in hard rock, and until gunpowder was discovered some 400 years ago the process of breaking rock was a very slow and expensive one. But we are told that if we purchase 1,300,000,000 ounces of silver we will increase the demand for silver and cause overproduction. Seventy-three percent of the silver production of the world is a by-product in the production of other metals, such as copper, lead, and zinc. The increased price of silver without a corresponding increase in the price of other metals with which it is associated would not justify any great increase in production. Even in 1920, when the price of silver was higher than at any time since 1873, the world produced considerably less silver than in 1930 or 1931, when the price of silver was the lowest ever known in the history of the world. The unprecedented low price of silver in the past few years was not due to overproduction but rather to oversupply coming from such unnatural sources as the action of the British Government in forcing India off the silver standard and in melting up her silver coin into bullion and dumping this bullion upon the markets of the world, and the actions of other governments in debasing the silver, using substitutes for silver in circulation, reducing the silver content of the divisionary coinage in countries like Great Britain, and so forth. It is admitted by every careful student that the silver question is not one of current production or new silver.

The supply of silver on the market has in post-war years been greatly stimulated by large amounts of redundant silver sold by governments. The highest production for any one year was 260,000,000 ounces. Although the revenue derived from silver alone from most of the mines in the United States is not very large in comparison with the revenues derived from the other metals with which silver is associated, yet it is an important item in the cost of production of the other metals. Experts tell us that in most metallurgical processes that treat ores low in silver, the silver content is finally concentrated in the impure metal bullion without additional costs. The refining of this impure bullion frequently is necessary owing to impurities other than silver so that the final recovery and purification of silver is accomplished with comparatively little cost. The revenue thus derived from silver in ores low in silver is, therefore, an important factor in the profits of metal ores and will enable the producers of the other metals with which silver is associated to sell their products more cheaply. These other metals are very important to the industrial progress of the United States. The cost of these other metals is an important factor in the modernization of railroads by electrification and in the improvement generally of industry. But although as an incidental consequence of this bill the silver mines will be helped some, and will be able to put more men to work and sell their products cheaper to industry, the purpose of this bill is not to help the silver mines and the silver-producing States. I do not have any silver mines in my district or in my State, and I do not own one dollar of silver or silver stock in the world; and if this bill had no other purpose except to help the silver States, I would not vote for it. An increase in the world price of silver would cause the rise in the real purchasing power of silver income, lighten the burdens of debt in silver-standard countries, and in countries in which silver is held in the form of bars or ornaments, such as India, as an investment, a rise in the gold value of silver is equivalent, so far as its buying power over goods is generally concerned, to an increase of capital. Due to the present low price, vast silver hordes in India and China in terms of gold are worthless and they are also worthless in terms of world commodities.

Therefore, when we increase the world price of silver we increase the real purchasing power of the millions of people of India who hold in the form of bars or ornaments their investment and capital; and when we restore their purchasing power they will buy the products of this country to a larger extent than now prevails. But if the fall in the gold price of silver continues, these people will eventually lose confidence in the white metal, and they will get rid of it, and this will contribute still further to the decline in the gold price of silver. Not only does the fall in the world price of silver hurt the silver-using countries, but it also injures the silver-producing countries. The United States, Canada, and Mexico produce 75 percent of the silver of the world, while Great Britain produces about the same percentage of gold. When the price of silver falls very low, the cost of the production of the other metals with which it is associated necessarily increases, which means less production, higher prices, and unemployment in the mines. In Mexico silver mining is an important element in the total industrial activities of the country. It constituted, on the average of 1925 to 1929, 17 percent of her exports. The tremendous fall in the gold value of silver reduced the importing capacity of Mexico, and therefore Mexico purchased less of our surplus products. Therefore, an increase in the world price of silver will mean that Mexico, with millions of people, will be able to purchase more of our surplus products.

Mr. Chairman, this bill comes to the House in the nature of a compromise as representing the limit to which the President of the United States is willing to go in the program of remonetization. We all know what the history has been during the present session of Congress. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures conducted exhaustive hearings on this question. So did the Committee on Banking and Currency. There has existed in the House, as well as in the other body, a division of opinion as regards the most advisable way of remonetizing silver. There are many schools of thought on this subject, as there are on practically every other subject, but the great difficulty has always been to compose those differences.

Those Members who view this bill as revolutionary, or unsound, do not stop to consider that the proportion of silver to gold in the Treasury of the United States today is only 12 percent, whereas in 1900 it was 27 percent, and prior to 1900 the proportion of metallic silver to metallic gold in the Treasury of the United States was 50 percent. So this bill is a restoration of the normal proportion that existed up until a comparatively recent time between silver and gold.

The gentleman who preceded me seems to think that this bill is an effort to give the country an unsound currency. Let me say to the gentleman that in 1929 the bank-deposit turn-over was twelve hundred billions of dollars—that was the checks, or the total volume of business as represented by check turn-over. The peak of 1929 was decreased until last year the check turn-over amounted to about four hundred and forty billions of dollars. That caused perhaps the greatest deflation ever witnessed by this or any other country.

So there was a tremendous deflation in our circulating media in the United States. As the result of that values on the stock market fell from $84,000,000,000 to $15,000,000,000, and according to estimates of certain economists the total property values of the United States shrunk $200,000,000,000.

The certificates issued on this silver will not be unsound because there will be behind these certificates more metallic reserve than there is behind the Federal Reserve bank notes today, for under laws passed by Congress we have back of the Federal Reserve bank notes today securities and collateral, but no gold. Prior to the revaluation of gold there was behind our Federal Reserve notes 40-percent gold. We will have behind these certificates, if silver reaches the price of 64½ cents an ounce, more intrinsic value than we have behind the Federal Reserve notes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is a mandatory expression to the President of the United States by the Congress that it is the wish and determination of Congress that the reserve of silver in the Treasury of the United States be built up until it reaches 25 percent; and I say to the Members of the House, as I said to the Committee on Ways and Means, that it would be a most serious mistake, in my judgment, for the President of the United States to accept a bill of this character, to procure a compromise of this character, to give assurances that he will make a bona fide effort to carry it out, if he does not intend to do it. I for one prefer to have confidence in the Chief Executive of this Nation; and I, therefore, feel confident in making the prediction that the President of the United States will exert every reasonable effort to carry out the purposes and intent of this bill. [Applause.]

If the President does carry out the intent of this bill, there will be as much silver added to the stocks in the Treasury of the United States as there would have been under the Fiesinger bill or any other silver purchase bill that has been proposed in the House of Representatives, with the possible exception of the bill introduced by my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Before I get through I will yield to the gentleman.

In the United States there could not be a safer money than money redeemable in a metal, for certainly as long as our currrency issue is tied to a metal and that metal is limited by nature and the metal cannot be unduly increased by the whims or caprices of those in charge of the Government or in obedience to political pressure, we have money that not only has the credit of the Government behind it but we have money that has an intrinsic value behind it as well.

There are gentlemen who talk of inflation, gentlemen who throw their hands up in horror and view this bill as the beginning of a great inflationary period in the United States. They should remember that today we are suffering from the most disastrous credit inflation the world ever witnessed. Of all kinds of inflations that have occurred, the most disastrous kind is credit inflation, because back of the credit money that we have in the United States is nothing but thin air.

The First National Bank wants to create a reserve of a million dollars in a Federal Reserve bank. It does not ship gold to the Federal Reserve bank. It gives its check on some other bank, and through a bookkeeping account there is built up in the Federal Reserve System a credit of $1,000,000 upon which is erected the credit structure, and for every $10 of reserve the bank that holds the reserve is able to lend you and I $100. Through this fictitious process we are able to erect a gigantic colossus of credit that is on a narrow foundation; and when confidence is destroyed—for after all confidence is nothing but suspicion asleep—the whole colossal structure falls upon a moment's notice. Therefore, we are giving to the country, under this bill, a sound currency, a currency that not only has the credit of the Government behind it but has a metallic basis. The time has come when we must erect as a foundation for our credit and currency structure a sound metallic base.

Had we during the abnormal period that culminated in the crash of 1929 insisted that as a foundation for our credit and currency structure there should be a broad metallic base, and had we by our laws and by the operation of the Federal Reserve bank made it impossible for speculators to use the Federal Reserve bank until the loans to brokers alone increased 500 percent, there would not have been an unhealthy situation created. The loans to the brokers increased 500 percent, and the whole Federal Reserve System was used by the speculators in order to do what? To create an unhealthy condition of credit which ultimately resulted in the greatest deflation we have ever seen.

I say one of the principal purposes of this bill is to give to the people of the United States a new supply of sound money, money redeemable in metal, and may I also say that your silver certificates are the only kind of certificates today that are redeemable in metal. The silver certificates under the law today are the soundest currency that you possess, for your Federal Reserve notes now held by the banks are not redeemable in gold except at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. Behind your bank notes and greenbacks, how much gold do you have? You have $1,700,000,000 of currency in the United States which prior to revaluation was not backed up and not supported by an equal value of gold. Therefore those gentlemen who seek to compare this bill with the Sherman Purchase Act and with the Bland-Allison Act are wrong. I concede that the Sherman Purchase Act was a bad law. It was a bad law because in the first instance it announced to the world that the Government of the United States was prepared to purchase 4,500,000 ounces of silver every month; and, then, it was a bad law because under the construction that the Secretary of the Treasury gave it—and he was not friendly to silver—he had to redeem the Treasury notes issued in payment for the silver in gold. What happened? Those who sold the Government of the United States silver and accepted Treasury notes went to the Treasury and redeemed the notes with gold notes and as a consequence we were being drained of our gold. When the Sherman Purchase Act was repealed it did not have a friend in the United States Senate or in the House of Representatives.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. DIES. Even those who voted against its repeal admitted that the reason they voted that way was because they were unwilling to repeal the Sherman Purchase Act unless some adequate substitute was offered.

May I say to the House that this bill does not, of course, represent everything that all of us would like to have.

Legislation is essentially a matter of compromise. Some gentlemen have pronounced views on this subject. They believe in a ratio of 16 to 1. Others believe in an unlimited purchase act, but when the other body and when the President of the United States indicate so strongly that they are unwilling to accept such legislation, you and I, necessarily, must reach some compromise with them.

Mr. PARSONS. I was in favor of that bill providing we could export agricultural commodities.

Will the gentleman yield for one further brief question?

Mr. DIES. I do not want to yield, but I will say that the gentleman has done some very excellent work on the silver question and I think the gentleman is one of the best-informed men in the House on this subject. [Applause.]

Some gentlemen are assuming that the President of the United States is not going to carry out the purpose of this bill. They assume that when the President accepts a bill which is mandatory in its nature and when he gives assurances that he will use every reasonable effort to carry it out, the President is not going to do so. I am assuming that the President will do so, and when you and I voted on the gold revaluation act that came to our committee, we realize that it was discretionary with the President of the United States; that we did not devalue the gold content.

What we did, in effect, was to authorize and direct the President to do so, and the President promptly did so; and I believe that, under this bill, expressing as it does a mandatory intention and determination of Congress, the President of the United States will carry it out; and I further say to the gentlemen of this House that, under the operation of this bill, if the President issues currency to the fullest extent possible, we will give the people of this country a sound currency; not like the phantom money that we have had in the past 10 years, not money that can be withdrawn overnight, not money that disappears suddenly, but money that will stay in circulation and a money that will be sound in every respect. I believe in giving the Nation money of this sort which is backed up with an adequate metallic base and a money that cannot be unduly increased or decreased.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] is the first man, to my knowledge, in the House of Representatives, to introduce a bill for the purchase of silver and the issuance of silver certificates in payment for it [applause] and the redemption of those silver certificates with silver. After the introduction of this bill similar bills were introduced in both Houses and Mr. CROSS of Texas has contributed a great deal to the success of the silver movement. I also wish to take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate my able and distinguished colleague, Mr. SWANK, of Oklahoma, who has been a most valuable member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. As a member of this committee, Mr. SWANK supported my bill actively in season and out of season and moved the favorable consideration of the bill. No man has contributed more to the success of silver remonetization than Mr. SWANK. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has rendered invaluable service to the remonetization of silver. This committee conducted extensive hearings over a long period of time, and the activity of this committee is largely responsible for the progressive monetary policies that are being put into effect.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER], the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAIR], the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CARPENTER], and the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. SOMERS of New York, have all worked very hard and contributed a great deal of thought and time to this subject. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LARRABEE] has been one of the hard working and valuable members on the committee; and, without seeking to advance any bill of his own, he has cooperated to the fullest extent in an effort to remonetize silver in the most practical way. I cannot overlook the splendid help and the active advocacy contributed by the distinguished gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], and the distinguished gentleman from Nevada, Governor SCRUGHAM, and my friend and colleague the able gentleman from Texas, Mr. SANDERS, who have been outstanding leaders in the silver movement in Congress. There are many others that I should like to mention by name, but time will not permit. However, it must be remembered that had it not been for the invaluable help given us by the Speaker of the House, the silver question would never have reached Congress for consideration. The distinguished Speaker of this House has for a long time been an advocate of silver remonetization and, on March 19 of this year, he recognized me to call up my silver bill. Had it not been for the attitude of the present Speaker it is reasonable to say that we would not have had any silver legislation during this session, and perhaps not for many sessions to come. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, the excellent presentation of his views by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] failed to take into account certain aspects of the problem, which may perhaps usefully be brought to our attention.

The House of late has been indulging in the practice of deluding the people of the United States. For example, the other day it passed a bill pretending to make relief possible for unpaid teachers in school districts, which, as a matter of fact, will bring no benefit to any school district outside of Chicago.

It also has sent over to the Senate a substitute for the McLeod bill—another gold brick—which will hold out possibility of relief to depositors in distress, but will fail to accomplish in any substantial degree what has been represented to be the purpose.

Here is another brick—not a gold brick but a silver brick—meant to delude a good part of the people of the United States into the belief that their hope of increasing the volume of currency will have been substantially met.

Mr. Chairman, I, too, believe in an adequate and sound currency, to be preserved at all hazards. The President of the United States on numerous occasions has expressed his belief in the same thing, and the Democratic Party, in its national platform, helped to secure a majority of the votes of the people of the United States by promising an adequate and sound currency.

So here once again I find myself clinging to Democratic principles while 9 out of 10 of the men on my right have abandoned them entirely.

Mr. CROSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. With great pleasure.

Mr. CROSS. Does the gentleman think that a currency that expands abnormally one day and contracts the next, as has happened in the past, is a sound currency?

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman would confuse the issue by failing to recognize that there are different kinds of currency. When the President spoke he was talking about cash currency, and to that I am now addressing myself. To have an adequate and sound cash currency is a great desideratum.

Let us consider the sources of demand for real action. First is the evident desire of a large number of inhabitants of the United States for printing-press or any other kind of fiat money. I will admit that this bill does contemplate increase of fiat money. It proposes to increase the number of coins that pretend to be worth a dollar. The intrinsic value of the metal content of a silver dollar is today about one-third of a dollar. Fiat money is money the intrinsic value of which does not correspond to the allegation on the disk or the printed slip.

I am not worrying much over that. I do not care whether you have fiat money of tin, aluminum, leather, or paper as long as you admit that it is fiat money and will keep it redeemable in sound money.

Mr. CROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. With pleasure.

Mr. CROSS. If you take from gold the statutory provision that so many grains shall be legal tender for all debts payable, public and private, then its intrinsic value will drop down to possibly one-fourth of what its fiat statutory value now is, would it not?

Mr. LUCE. Oh, I could not accept that statement.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am very much impressed with the frank statement of my distinguished colleague in regard to fiat money. I do not think I could have misunderstood him. Assuming that we had a Federal Reserve note before we went off the gold standard, do I understand the gentleman to say that so much of that Federal Reserve note as is backed by collateral other than gold itself would be fiat money?

Mr. LUCE. No; that would not be fiat money, because it is credit currency backed by what is presumed to be equivalent value.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman mean to say that that part of the Federal Reserve note that has for its backing commercial paper—that would put it outside of the category of fiat money?

Mr. LUCE. I do.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In other words, then, the gentleman makes a distinction between a Federal Reserve note with 40-percent gold reserve, with 60-percent commercial paper, and such currency that is issued against a Federal Government obligation alone?

Mr. LUVE. To my mind a sound but adequate currency means a currency that has behind it and will be exchanged for it value in exchange corresponding to the purport of the face of the metal or paper in question.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Then the gentleman does not define fiat money as that money or currency that does not have a metal reserve for redemption.

Mr. LUCE. I define fiat money as anything which is an untruth.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. On the basis of my colleague's contention on the Federal Reserve note, where you have 40 cents of gold and 60 cents credit of the Nation and credit of the banks behind it, if everybody called for their money at the same time, you could only get 40 cents gold and the rest would be fiat money. Is that right?

Mr. LUCE. I shall repeat the story that I told before about the undertaker who was asked why he kept so few coffins. He replied that the people did not all die at once. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIROVICH. That is what happened a short while ago when the collapse took place.

Mr. PATMAN rose.

Mr. LUCE. Now, if I may continue my remarks——

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Oh, I wish to carry on the liquid, pellucid flow of my remarks. [Laughter.] I had started out, I believe, to name the sources of the demand for this legislation, and began with the masses of the people who in all ages have believed that they would be better off if they had more money, forgetting that they would have to work in order to earn it. They want the dole system upon which we have so broadly embarked extended to doles of paper and silver money.

The second source of demand for this is from the mine owners of the country, and here I am not resisting with any hope of success, because we have entered upon a period when the prime purpose of the party in power is to gratify the demand of groups and classes, and that group and class which can shout the loudest is the one that carries home the bacon. With bill after bill granting special privileges to various classes, I can understand how my friends out in Nevada and Arizona and Idaho do not want to be left out in the cold. They have been coming here year after year for a generation, demanding special privileges, and surely it would be cruel to thwart them, now that they have their opportunity to get their hands into the barrel.

The third source of demand for this legislation comes from far-sighted enterprisers—men who, for the most part, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, are damned, are objurgated—that is a pretty good word, is it not?—are roundly abused because their offices are in the neighborhood of a street in New York known as "Wall Street." I think these particular people have their headquarters nearer Broad Street, and so you can substitute Broad Street for Wall Street if you should take a hint from what I am pointing out and, when you get your eyes open, you will recognize as having been a big factor in what you are doing today. These men are among the chief backers of an organization known as "the Committee for the Nation", and they have been sending their propaganda here for months, urging among other things that something be done for silver. These of the chief backers are mostly brokers—brokers in exports and imports, and brokers in metals. It is in passing to be observed that the most active element in that group has been a brokerage firm patronized by the Radio League of the Little Flower, which undertook to lift $20,000 up to near $200,000 by resorting to what, in effect, is buying on margin.

I understand the money raiser of that organization, the Radio League of the Little Flower, roundly objects to speculation and gambling. I wish he might have made himself better acquainted with what his secretary was doing. Possibly he remembered the scriptural injunction, "Let not your left hand know what your right hand doeth."

Turning from the men who hope to make money out of this thing, observe the generosity of those who have shaped the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. LUCE. There is an old saying, "It is a sin to steal a pin, it is a greater to steal a 'tater." Here is a 50-percent—shall I call it steal—on the part of the Government, taking away 50 percent of the profits that are going to be made out of the passage of this bill. Perhaps that may be justified on the ground that 100 percent, taking it all, would be inhuman.

How cruel it would be, after this great amount of money that the silver speculators have expended on propaganda, after all the printer's ink they have put out, if you should deprive them of all possible profits they had in mind. So I will not criticize that, out of consideration for, out of charity for those who have been building up this movement. I expect that you will only take half of what they make out of it. Imagine my own perplexity as to the ethics of the matter.

I do not think this bill is of grave importance. I recognize that it is nothing but a delusion, that it was perpetrated in order to try to stave off something worse; so, as good pragmatists, the gentlemen on my right have accepted a thing they know is nothing but a shadow. However, there is one man in the United States who does not take that position, for on the 2d of May, this month, the New York Times published this:

> The bill for the mandatory remonetization of silver is probably the most destructive and dangerous proposal ever made at Washington.

Which one of the conservatives and reactionaries do you think made that statement? Whom will you pillory? I will tell you whom you may pillory. That was the opinion of Raymond Moley [laughter], editor of Today and the original member of President Roosevelt's "brain trust." What are you going to do when you find a house divided against itself; when you find a member of the "brain trust" saying this is probably the most destructive and dangerous proposal ever made at Washington, and the other part of the "brain trust" saying that only through this door may we start toward salvation?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Oh, certainly.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. What is the date of the statement which the gentleman just read?

Mr. LUCE. May 2, 1934.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman think Mr. Moley could have been referring to a bill that had not been introduced until May 23, 1934?

Mr. LUCE. I am not disposed to deny the power of foresight to the "brain trust." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I think I had better stop there. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this bill, as I view it, is the fulfillment of the political promise of the President to the silver interests of the United States, wherein he promised he would do something for silver. There is a question in my mind, however, as to whether or not there is the relief which the silver interests of the United States expect and demand in this particular bill. It is in line with a policy which has been carried on for a long time past, to involve the United States in international affairs. Silver is an international product. It is quite in keeping with the plans of the Bank for International Settlements, of Basel, Switzerland, which I have been calling attention to from the time it was organized. Their purpose now has not changed in any particular. They still have in mind that at the opportune time, which time they are waiting for, that there will be an international circulating medium, and that medium will be issued and controlled by the Bank of International Settlements. If this bill is carried out, it will take away from the monetary reserves, which have always been held sacred in this country, 25 percent of the gold and will substitute silver, which is a highly fluctuating metal in the world's markets and in the world's exchanges, and if this silver is purchased abroad the Treasury will have to pay for it in gold. This, then, will be an exchange of our gold for silver. It continues the uncertainty which we are in the midst of, due to these experimental policies which are being carried out by this administration. To the extent of 25 percent, it decreases the confidence of the public in our monetary system.

We are now beginning to realize the fact that the gold bill and other measures which were passed at the last session of Congress and at this session dealing with our monetary policy, are all creations of uncertainty, and none of them is scoring the record which the administration promised the country. The lowering of the gold content of the dollar by 40 percent has not increased agricultural prices 40 percent and the advocates of this plan are now crying for an additional 10-percent cut in the gold content of the dollar.

In connection with the lowering of the gold content of the dollar by 40 percent which was authorized in the bill passed last January, and now the actually taking away of 25 percent of the gold reserves as provided in this bill, and the still further possibility of the lowering of the gold content of the dollar by 10 percent more, the remarks of a friend to me the other day are quite pertinent when he asked: "What punishment will be meted out to President Roosevelt when his empire collapses?" referring of course to the juggling of the monetary policy and the political-economic planning schemes which this administration are carrying into effect. His further queries were: "If President Roosevelt was in charge of a warehouse for wheat would he issue certificates of wheat on deposit in the warehouse in excess of the wheat stored therein? Should he be permitted to print and use those fraudulent certificates so issued in the purchase of other wheat? Would reducing the content of the wheat in a bushel enhance its value? Would a half bushel of wheat still be a half bushel? If President Roosevelt could increase the supply of wheat in the warehouse 2,000,000,000 bushels by reducing the amount of wheat in the bushel 40 percent, then why not do it a second time and increase the amount of wheat in the warehouse 4,000,000,000 bushels or 80 percent? If a little is good, more is better? Are our farmers not a lot of fools for all this labor planting and sowing when they could give their wheat to President Roosevelt and have him juggle it in the warehouse and thus increase the amount which would be equal to raising a crop of wheat? These are pertinent questions that my friend has raised and are pertinent to this very bill under consideration.

One thing I regret in connection with this particular legislation is the fact that the Members of this House and Senate who are asked to pass upon this are taking a leap in the dark. I venture to say there is hardly a man in this House who understands the meaning of the proposal in this bill. We have evidence of the fact that those who are in charge, officially, of the administration of this monetary policy even themselves have not the knowledge to administer it. The arguments which have been presented by the President of the United States in connection with these matters, do not indicate a knowledge of where these monetary policies are leading us. The Secretary of the Treasury has demonstrated before the committee of this House, dealing with these monetary policies, a lack of knowledge to administer these complicated systems which are being foisted upon the people of the United States. Men apparently behind the scenes, who are not even now known to the people of the United States and who are in the capacity of employment there and who even Members of Congress do not know, are the definite source or origin of this bill.

One of the main things that will reestablish business in the United States is confidence. The consideration and passage of ill-advised bills by the Congress, without the knowledge necessary to intelligently pass upon them, and the blind acceptance of these bills as coming from the so-called "brain trusters", is anything but tending to restore confidence in the mind of the American people now that they know these things are taking place. Under the gold bill we established in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury $2,000,000,000 in gold for the purpose of speculating in international exchanges, for the purpose of buying and selling Government securities, for the well-known purpose of maintaining a market, but at the present time we must all recognize the fact that the great power and influence not only of this fund but of all the resources of the United States through the Treasury of the United States are being used to maintain the market on Government securities at this time. The market on Government securities is pegged by the United States Treasury. Lavish expenditures by this administration of the taxpayers' money, the increase of public debt, is all tending to commotion in the minds of the average American, and has a tendency to weaken confidence. This tendency to violate contracts, and the definite trend toward repudiation of debts, which is a definite policy of this administration, is becoming more apparent each day. This bill is a plan of further repudiation—it permits the settlement of debts in an inferior money and reduces the gold content or reserves of our present dollar and substitutes silver to the extent of 25 percent. All of these changes in the value of our dollar gives our merchandise and the production from our farms to the foreigners at a still further reduced price and likewise reduces the amount this Government will get on war debts and other debts that are owed to our people.

Once the American mind wakes up fully to the fact that these monetary measures are unsound, impractical, and experimental, the American people will lose confidence in their Government. My friends, this is a false proposition that you are considering here today. It will undermine the confidence of the American people, and of the foreigner, in the stability of our money and in our credit system and in our Government.

The origin of this bill has been interesting to me. It seems to come from nowhere, is presented and is accepted by the Congress as an official document. No one yet has advised us, except privately, as to the authorship of this bill. Men who have studied this question, Members of this House, have expressed themselves to me that the origin of this bill was not in the United States, but in Great Britain. Is it possible that again today, after the experience of 1873, we are accepting, as we do accept, in the form of this legislation a dictation from Great Britain? Great Britain is not placing silver in her monetary system. She knows better.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am very sorry, but I am pressed for time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman has made a very serious charge. If the gentleman has no authority for his statement that the origin of this bill was not in the United States, he should retract his statement; and if he has authority for his statement, he should tell us what his authority is. I think I am prepared to tell the gentleman where the bill originated.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is confining himself to what he knows. About 3 years ago, when I was Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of this House, there came to my office a man who represented the international silver interests. He came fresh from London and suggested that the way to deal with the silver situation and to restore prosperity to the world was to restore the purchasing price of silver; and he suggested to me that in the gold reserves in the Treasury or the Federal Reserve where the gold bars were stored, that we should cut off 25 percent of the gold and paste on 25 percent of silver. That is the plan apparently adopted here today.

That gentleman was so clever as a propagandist that he secured employment as the expert on the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures of this House. His name is Rene Leon. He represents and is the real lobbyist of those who are interested in raising the price of silver, and I have no doubt but those men who have speculated in silver had advance information. England was very much interested in unloading the silver which had been poured into India when she put India on a gold basis. She is interested to dispose of that silver now. Just as we have become the world's market for gold, we are now going to become the world's market, at the increased price, for silver. India is selling us her abandoned silver now, not at the old price of around 20 cents, but at the new price created by the speculators who had inside information, like James P. Warburg and Bernard M. Baruch, whose concerns have made big profits in the speculation in silver. This action today, and the actions of the speculators, have increased the price of silver to over 46 cents per ounce, and the end is not yet.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am duly mindful of the fact that time for debate on this measure is rather limited. I realize fully that there are many Members who desire an opportunity to express their views on the measure, and I shall ask your indulgence for a short time only.

It has been rather interesting to observe some of the remarks made by distinguished gentlemen who raised their voices in opposition to the measure. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has just spoken in opposition to the bill, seems to have considerable doubt in his mind and to be worried to a great extent as to where the bill originated. For anybody who has taken the time to inform himself as to this legislation, anybody who has even glanced at the hearings on the bill, there could be no reason for any doubt as to where the bill originated or who drew it. The hearings speak very clearly and definitely. I asked Mr. Oliphant, counsel of the Treasury Department, who appeared before the committee, if he participated in the drafting of the bill, and he said "Yes." The bill was drafted down here in the Treasury Department.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania expresses considerable concern about what some former employee connected with the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures might have done—a man who had some conversation with the gentleman several years ago. This bill was introduced and immediately referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. So far as we are informed, no former employee of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has had any connection either directly or indirectly with this measure. This simply brings us to the conclusion that when gentlemen are without any sound reason or excuse for raising their voices in opposition to legislation they resort to the scheme of trying to raise straw men in order that they may knock them down. Now, there is not any doubt as to the origin of this bill or the purposes to be accomplished by the measure.

I listened with considerable interest to gentlemen on the other side of the aisle who spoke in opposition to the measure and who quoted with much interest and emphasis the remarks of a great Democratic President, Grover Cleveland. I yield to no man in admiration and respect for that great Democrat who was President of the United States when I was born; but, my friends, I am far more interested as one charged with some degree of responsibility in this body today, far more interested in the policies, and views, and program of Franklin D. Roosevelt than I am in those of Grover Cleveland 40 years ago. [Applause.] Several Members have made reference to the utterances of President Cleveland, but I respectfully submit that the important question that should challenge the attention and the thoughtful consideration of the Members of this House are the conditions in which we find ourselves today and what we are going to do to meet and remedy them.

The pending bill comes to the House in response to the message of President Roosevelt of May 22. In that very able document the President sets forth in clear and definite terms the reasons and necessities for this measure. It is in the interest of agriculture and the whole country and should be enacted promptly.

The bill contains certain mandatory provisions affecting the metallic base of our monetary system. In substance it provides that there shall be a purchase of silver up to the point that silver shall equal 25 percent of the total metallic base of the currency; in other words, it establishes a ratio of 25 percent silver and 75 percent gold. The bill provides that certificates shall be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury backed up and supported by this silver. The bill also contains certain safeguards which will make the plan and program effective, make it safe, and make it conform absolutely to the Democratic platform pledge of a sound currency for this country.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman very briefly.

Mr. CULKIN. Of course, the time is brief, but the gentleman is on the committee, and I desire to propound an inquiry, and I think the House has a right to have an answer which it has not had as yet.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. State it, please.

Mr. CULKIN. There are 100,000 people employed in the metal industries where silver is used. It is stated that this bill will put them out of employment. May I ask the gentleman if that is a fact or not?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I am confident it is not a fact. I assume the gentleman refers to commercial silver.

Mr. CULKIN. Yes! commercial silver.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Oh, no; it will not have any such effect.

Mr. CULKIN. Would the gentleman be in favor of an amendment expressly stating the fact that it shall not apply to commercial silver?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I do not think there will be any trouble about that matter. In fact, consideration is being given to some amendment of that kind. I conferred this morning with a representative of the Treasury Department, and if it is thought that there is any room for doubt or necessity for a clarification along that line I feel confident it will be offered.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman understands we are passing this legislation in a hurry and these 100,000 people should not be jeopardized.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I understand the point the gentleman has in mind and it is being given attention.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. I come from the largest silver-manufacturing city in the world. It has been my understanding that the situation just referred to has been taken care of in this bill, but I should like to have the gentleman's reassurance along that line.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I do not think there will be any trouble about that at all.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. We are going to look carefully into any amendment that may disturb the uniformity of this tax and render the whole thing illegal. The manufacturers are not being taxed in this bill.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I do not think there is any reason to be fearful of trouble on that score. I am sorry I do not have time to go into detail; but if the gentleman will examine the hearings he will find that numerous questions were asked, especially by our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. McCORMACK, on that very point. I do not have any doubt or fear along that line.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield just for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. I think this question is important, because it has not been made clear. It was stated that we would cut off part of the gold base and add to it the silver base. Does this bill propose to cut down the gold and add enough silver to it in order to keep up the amount of gold that we have on hand?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I do not understand this bill affects the Gold Revaluation Act at all. At the time the President sent his message here in January calling for the Gold Revaluation Act, he indicated at that time that further consideration should be given to the silver question. It is very definitely shown in the hearings on this bill that this is part of the plan that was adopted and inaugurated at that time.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman will yield, referring to the inquiry propounded in regard to commercial silver, may I say it was stated to our committee that the users of silver commercially bought their silver from the mine. When they buy it from the mine the market price of the newly mined silver is the cost of production. There is no tax paid upon this newly mined silver because of that fact, and consequently commercially used silver will escape payment of the tax because it is purchased from the mine.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I was going to follow up the remark I made to the gentleman over there by calling his attention to the point raised by the gentleman from Kentucky. It is very definitely shown by the hearings on this bill that this does not in any way affect newly mined silver. In fact, the bill clearly shows that the newly mined silver now being delivered to the Treasury under the proclamation issued by the President will not be disturbed or affected by the passage of this bill.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman for a brief question.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman point out the language in the bill that specifically exempts the newly mined silver?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. It is in the bill, and the gentleman may find it there.

Mr. PARSONS. I have searched in vain for it. It is in the hearings, but not in the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. If the gentleman will read the hearings, he will see that the man who drafted the bill states it is amply covered in the bill, because we asked him those identical questions.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman spoke of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] having in mind an amendment to the bill. I have read these hearings rather carefully, and I have read what it may cost the manufacturer who uses the silver. The question by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] in the committee brought nothing particularly satisfactory in reply. The gentleman from Tennessee says that these people need not worry, and that they buy direct from the mines. With this provision in the bill exempting them from paying the tax, would it be more difficult in the future for the manufacturer to get the silver from the mines? Would they not have to get it from the dealers?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I think I have explained that point as fully as I can to the gentleman, with the limited time I have.

Mr. GIFFORD. The hearings are not enlightening on that point.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The bill does not affect this newly mined silver that is now covered by the proclamation of the President of the United States. The commercial users of silver now get their supply from that source.

I shall not take much more time of the House, but I wish to discuss very briefly the tax provision of this bill as set out in section 8.

It is a matter of common knowledge that there has been agitation on this question for some time. It has been a live issue throughout the length and breadth of this Nation of ours. It is frequently stated that there has been some degree of speculation in silver. Some of the gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to the measure raised the question as to whether it is right for the Government to levy an excise tax of 50 percent of the profit that is made on this silver.

I maintain it is absolutely right and fair for the Government to do this, simply for the reason that this profit is being created by governmental action, and therefore it is nothing but fair and right that the Government should take part of the profit.

There is one other phase in connection with the tax and this is in response to the question raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], that the tax should be 100 percent. I simply call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this suggestion of a 100-percent tax would, at once, close the silver market in this country and such steps should not be taken now. If later it became necessary, this could be done under section 6. In the meantime we may need the New York market in carrying out the purpose of this program and we should not be dependent solely upon the London market.

We must realize there are two outstanding silver markets in the world today. One is London and the other is New York. If we should levy a 100 percent tax so as to close the market in this country, naturally, we would be at the mercy of the London market in trying to carry out this program and I do not think any of us would seriously contend that this would be at all desirable.

This is a very important administration measure, and a part of the recovery program of our great President, and in the interest of the whole country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, my first inclination was to vote for this legislation, because I believe if we were to go onto a bimetallic basis it would materially improve world commerce; and I am not unmindful of the fact that three-fifths of the people of the world live in countries that are on a silver basis, but when I got to looking over the list of speculators who have gone into the market and purchased millions and millions of ounces of silver on the strength of the passage of this legislation, it looked to me as though the whole thing had degenerated into a racket; and in voting for this legislation I would simply be voting to put millions and millions of dollars into the pockets of the big eastern banks and, in fact, the rich all over the country, who now hold all the free silver.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. The gentleman knows that Mr. Sanders, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, is one of the purchasers?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; and I do not hold any brief for Mr. Sanders. I have noticed when it comes to gouging the Government, party lines are obliterated.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield there?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. In view of the remark just made by the gentleman from Kentucky, is it not a fact that the office address of one of the chief silver Senators appears in this list?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I believe so.

These people who are trying to profit at the expense of the Government——

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I cannot yield now.

Mr. McFARLANE. I think the gentleman ought to name the Senator since he has mentioned that fact.

Mr. KNUTSON. I did not mention him.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is easy enough to name him.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would put his name in the RECORD if the rules permitted my doing so.

Mr. McFARLANE. Well, name him.

Mr. KNUTSON. We cannot do that under the rules of the House.

Mr. McFARLANE. For the protection of the other 95 Senators, I think the gentleman should name the Senator he has in mind.

Mr. TREADWAY. If the statement I have made is challenged in any way, I may say that the office number of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] appears in this list, published at the request of the Senate.

Mr. KNUTSON. I think every Member before voting on this legislation should secure this list and look over the names of the hoarders who appear in part 2 of the hearings. There are 50 pages of them and most of the big banks of the country are represented.

I am sorry a situation has arisen that will make it impossible for me to vote for this legislation, because I really feel we should go on a bimetallic basis in order to improve the commerce of the country, but I cannot vote to put millions and millions of dollars into the pockets of the silver speculators of this country, who are the big New York bankers. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Okhaloma [Mr. McCLINTIC].

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, I venture to assert that there has been delivered more opinions on the silver question than on any one other subject that ever affected the American people, and it is only natural that the debate on this bill will bring out different viewpoints.

I do not profess to know very much about silver and when it is taken into consideration that there are four prices quoted for the same in its various uses, one can understand why the subject is difficult, yet I am sure that if the Members of the House could have attended the hearings and heard the able presentation made by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] that they would have been convinced that he had given the subject a lot of study and knew what he was talking about. I have come to the conclusion that the increase of the ratio of silver on the basis of one-fourth of the amount of gold now in our possession as a base for the issuing of currency would be extremely beneficial and for this reason I intend to support the bill.

I am particularly interested in one phase of the money question and that is covered in the bill I introduced yesterday, which was printed in the RECORD. It would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to use our unpledged gold and silver and certain other securities as a base for the issuing of greenbacks, to be used in the retirement of outstanding tax-free Government bonds and securities. We owe some $25,000,000,000, and most of this is represented by bonds and certificates of indebtedness which are merely a form of paper used to evidence the debt. Custom and habit has caused a large number of our citizens to feel that this is the proper way for the Government to obtain money when in truth greenbacks when properly secured can be issued without causing the Government to pay interest and thus perform the same service as long as it is backed up by a proper amount of securities.

I do not think that it is right to allow a fortunate class to invest their money in such a way as to enable them to escape paying their part of the cost of running this Government. If the notes and mortgages on our public land and the forms of security issued by industry are of sufficient value for the Government to make loans on, who is it can say that it would be unwise to use a fraction of their value in paper money? If the Federal Reserve Banking System extends credit on the basis of 10 to 1, who is it that can say that our unpledged gold and silver will not support an issue of currency on the basis of 2½ to 1?

A lot of people made fun of the first bill introduced to guarantee deposits in Government-supervised banks. They predicted all kinds of catastrophes, yet when I presented this measure I felt sure the time would come when such a law would be necessary to stabilize banking conditions and recent events prove this to be a fact. It may be several years before we are able to mold public sentiment in favor of the bill I introduced yesterday, yet I am convinced that if Congress does not take some such action as this, that there will be rough sledding ahead for our Government, as the people will and can stand only so much.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlemen on the other side for this allotment of time. Of course, one cannot hope to present even briefly all his views on the more important points in such a measure in that length of time. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] said that this was a silver brick. I say to the House that this is a gold brick; it is not a silver measure according to my views. It coins more of our old silver dollars, deficient and fluctuating in value, and good only because supported by gold.

Something has been said here about fiat money. As I understand, fiat money represents money that does not have full value back of it. You have silver in the silver dollar worth about 35 cents, and you call it a dollar, so it is fiat money to the extent of the difference between 35 cents and the dollar.

I do not mean to say that this is fiat money. It is not fiat money, but it would be fiat money if it were not for the fact that we have a law passed in 1890 which compels the Secretary of the Treasury to use our reserves to keep all the money of the United States at a parity with gold.

These obligations have been heaped on gold until gold has broken down. Gold has so many demands, such increasing and ever-increasing demands, that gold as a yardstick of measure has failed, and with it has come all our property values, and, therefore, of course, our credit structure built up on these failing property values. What we want is something to relieve gold, something to take the place of gold, something we can give legal-tender privileges to just as we have given to gold.

We need to give silver legal-tender qualities. But this bill does not do that. This bill makes the silver dollar legal tender, but not silver values. The silver dollar has a value backed by gold to sustain its value. We need to give silver legal-tender privileges where all the necessary value is supplied by silver and by silver alone and unsupported by gold. This bill fails to provide that use of silver. So this is really gold money. You have put 35 cents' worth of silver back of it, or some other or fluctuating value back of it, but it is, after all, to be kept at a parity with gold by the addition to that value from gold.

But that is not the objection I have to the bill. I have this objection: That while you may be making sound money out of this silver, you are increasing all the time the strain upon gold and increasing its value; and when you increase the value of gold, which is the supreme measurement of all of our property and commodities, when you put an additional strain upon gold, you are lowering the value of your wheat and your cotton and your copper and your real estate and all the property in the United States. That is the objection that I have to this proposition; not that it is not sound money, but you are increasing the strain upon gold that is already worth 75 cents more to the dollar than it was on January 1, 1926. I introduced a bill, which was voted out by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, which was voted out by a very large majority, and after more than a year's study by the committee in consultation with some of the world's greatest experts and, what is more to the point, these were experts who were not allied with the banking organizations, who seem interested in not having our Congress control these depressions. This bill went to the Rules Committee, where it has slumbered and has been chloroformed ever since. There have been 101 Members of the House who have asked the Rules Committee to give us a rule on the bill. That bill would use silver for its world-accepted value. In other words, it would make silver itself legal tender and therefore primary money. We would redeem those certificates, not in gold but in the gold value of silver. We would keep the gold standard as a means for the measure of our values. We would not have two standards of measurement. But we would have silver and gold as money. We would give legal tender to silver. We would take a control over our supply of legal-tender wealth; gold as our superme standard of measurement and both gold and silver serving us as debt-paying property, using silver to help take the strain off gold as a circulating medium, thus reducing its value, and thereby raising commodity value. That is the point of it.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] said that this bill that I propose contemplates the purchase of 1,500,000,000 ounces of silver. That is the maximum limit of the bill. The purchase of silver in that bill is to restore prosperity. It would put into the Treasury of the United States silver as reserve money, with full value as legal tender until prosperity is restored, and we would issue certificates against it for its world-accepted value, no more and no less, and you would have money that is sound money and at the same time silver money. There would be no fiat money about that, and you would not tie it to gold. My bill would continue adding silver to our reserves as needed to break the corner and relieve the strain upon gold until gold would fall and property rise in value, until the banks regained confidence in loans on this property, and until our products could find buyers in the markets of the world. Take out that abnormal purchasing price of gold and you thereby raise up the value of commodities and property all over the world. You would relieve the banks in foreign countries where gold is the standard of value, and this would restore the demand for the commodities that we sell in international markets.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Ultimately this bill is going to cost the Government about a billion dollars in the form of the increased cost of silver?

Mr. FIESINGER. I am not prepared to answer that question. I had not looked at it from that phase. The cost will mainly lie in the failure of the bill and the cost of continuing the depression. It is not going to accomplish what we want and what we need. It will not give us control of the value of property, of credits, and business activity. It will not result in the raising of the prices of our prime commodities that we sell in international markets for gold; and you are not going to cure, as a result of this measure, your wheat or cotton problem or the problem of those commodities that we sell in international markets.

Mr. Chairman, I am in a difficult situation today and it pains me more than I can tell to take the position that I am taking in the House today. I would love to go along, but I disagree with this bill. I have very deep convictions on this proposition. However, I believe that rather than not following the President of the United States I am following the President of the United States. He has declared for an adequate supply of sound money. To have that supply we must have some control of it, and that is the difference between these two bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, the President said in his message to Congress that he wanted to make primary money out of silver, the same as gold. This bill is not doing that. It is making token money, and it would be fiat money, if it were not for the law of 1890.

On the other point that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] spoke of, when he said that this is a sop to the silver interests in this country. It is a sop, but it has a trick in it; and when the silver people in this House and the other body get back to their constituents and they find out what the bill means there is just going to be murder, in my judgment. This bill has stated a policy of having 25 percent silver reserve. It has a little clause in it that will stop the purchase of silver long before it reaches 25 percent. There is another joker for the silver miner. The bill provides for $1.29 an ounce for silver, but it is a new 14-gram dollar that will get down to a lesser value in time; and the bill also provides the Secretary of the Treasury can take away from the miner in seignorage 50 percent or more if he likes. He can leave the miner with 64 cents an ounce in a 60-cent dollar, or about 38 cents an ounce in the original gold value. This bill does another thing that destroys the value of silver as real money; it makes it a felony to own silver or transport any silver except that it finds lodgment in the Treasury of the United States. That means that the only purchaser of silver in the United States under the terms of the bill will be the Government of the United States, and it may frequently defer purchases. There is no time fixed when it shall purchase, and it may defer purchases until the value of silver has fallen down to the lowest possible gold price level that it can find. If that is so, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States has it in his hand to control every mining State in the United States through political control; and this is establishing a principle abhorrent to our institutions as well as fixing an artificial market for silver.

So much for that. The argument is made here today that we are going to furnish the American people more money. We already have plenty of money in our gold. We need to use this silver in an entirely different way. We need to invoke an entirely different monetary principle. We have plenty of gold as a base to erect credit upon, and this little silver that they are going to put in is not going to make any difference so far as increasing the supply of money is concerned. We need to use this silver in such a way that you can get money out. What we need is to have the price level raised, and that is not altogether to be done in the United States but it has to be done in all gold-standard countries. It must be done throughout the world. When the gold price level starts to rise, after you take the strain off gold, your banks know that they can make loans with safety. Their clients can make profits instead of losses, and then they safely can, and they will, furnish plenty of money. That is the only way that you will be able to get out of this depression and get money out among the people. The little money involved in this silver issue is not even pocket change in comparison with twenty or more billions of loosened bank credits. You will find gold values will not be put under your control through this bill. As a consequence, your banks will be in the same position they are now—frozen, as they are, and will not make any loans—and, as a consequence, the people will be starving for credit, as they are today.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, the enactment of this bill into a law means little or nothing in the way of encouragement to those who believe in bimetalism. If I can convince myself that it is even a tiny step toward expansion of our metallic base for currency, I shall vote for it on final passage, but I shall so vote with the bitterest regret that it is impossible, at this session, to vote for a real silver bill.

We, who believe in the quantitative theory of money, which is correct when all factors are considered, such as velocity and bank checks, can get very little comfort out of legislation which treats silver as a commodity. What we need, above everything else, is work for the unemployed and money to pay them. The President can, under powers already granted, issue millions of dollars in currency. Other countries have issued such currency, forcing commodity prices to higher levels. Often, such inflation has ended in disaster. What we silver men want is a larger, broader metallic base upon which currency may be issued. Never again in this country will gold circulate as money, and silver will so circulate only in small denominations, under $1. To prevent overexpansion of paper currency we must, at present, have a metallic base. If gold could come forth in carload lots, as it has come at different times in the world's history, then we might not now need the silver in quantity; but gold is not coming. The demands for currency are heavier than ever. The loss of confidence has materially reduced bank accounts, checks, and velocity of exchange. Governments must provide more yardsticks for measuring property exchanges, or repudiation of debts will follow, and backward will move the wheels of civilization.

The greatest need of the hour is higher, much higher, prices for commodities in the world's markets. I cannot believe that every nation will be economically self-contained and that world's trade will practically cease. By "unanimous consent" the gold ounce is the universally acknowledged measuring stick for the world's trading. No legislation by this Congress can change that situation. Neither England nor France care or heed in the least how many grains of gold we declare to be a legal dollar. Balances are settled by the weight of gold.

Why has silver depreciated in terms of gold? For the simple reason that silver has been demonetized by many nations and the demand has been materially reduced. Silver has not fallen in value when measured in commodities, but gold has appreciated, owing to the greater demand for that metal for storage as a base for issuance of currency. Create an unlimited demand for silver at a fixed price, as measured in gold, and that price will be the world price. The remonetization of silver by the United States will force other trading nations to do the same. Real silver men do not want to see the gold now in our Treasury used to buy silver in either foreign or domestic markets.

Let the owners of that silver take it to our mints, have it weighed and graded, and left there in bars; then issue silver currency against such deposits.

Why the fear of really useful silver legislation? Are the owners of our bonds and obligations afraid that those bonds and obligations are not going to be so valuable when measured in commodities? That is precisely what must happen, or general repudiation will follow. The load of interest and fixed dividends can never be paid at the present prices of commodities. This bill will not materially affect commodity prices; therefore it is of little or no value in the present economic crisis. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal said about silver today and a great deal said since this Congress convened, after the inauguration of the new administration. I am firmly convinced that the money question is the most important question before the American people today. The statement has been repeatedly made, and it was made on the floor today, that there is ample cash, ample money; that the banks are loaded with money; that the only trouble is a restoration of confidence; that if we could have confidence restored business would go on and we would have prosperity and recovery from the depression. What is needed to restore confidence? There is just one little element missing in our whole financial set-up, and that is the element called "cash." Now, this bill is directed to supplying the missing element. If there is sufficient cash or money in circulation in the country, prices will rise and confidence will return; but you cannot restore confidence when prices are falling. If you go to your banker for a loan, he is not interested in your collateral; he is not interested in your assets if prices are falling. You have got to show that in the operation of your business you can make a profit. Profits accrue from business where there is a return in excess of the expenses. We must supply that little element called "cash."

I want to read from section 5 of this bill. It does not seem to have been very well understood what the bill contains. Section 5 reads:

> The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue silver certificates in such denominations as he may from time to time prescribe in a face amount not less than the cost of all silver purchased under the authority of section 3.

Further on it reads:

> All silver certificates heretofore or hereafter issued shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, duties, and dues, and shall be redeemable on demand of the Treasury of the United States in standard silver dollars.

That is the answer to the question that has been raised as to the cost of operation of this bill. If we can only get a sympathetic Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to carry out the provisions of this act and buy silver and issue silver certificates, we will have that much more money in circulation. I mean we will have that much more money in circulation without somebody having to borrow it, without the interest feature attached. That is what is stopping the loaning of money today, because when you go to a bank, you must borrow. This money will go into circulation without the interest feature attached to it and as new wealth.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I wish the gentleman would explain to the House the mechanics provided by this bill, whereby it will put money into the pockets of the average man, where it will put money into general circulation. I tried to secure that information in the committee during the hearing. I have tried in other ways to get it, and as yet I have found no one who can give a reasonable explanation of how this particular bill, if enacted, will put additional money into the pockets of the workingman and into the pockets of the farmer. After all, they have to work for what they get. I wish the gentleman would enlighten the House on that particular point.

Mr. WHITE. Under the mechanics of this bill it is proposed to add one and one-third billion dollars of silver to the reserve of the United States. Under section 5 the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue and put into circulation $1 for every dollar expended to acquire that silver.

Mr. WOODRUFF. How?

Mr. WHITE. Well, how? It will go into the natural channels of trade as money goes in by paying the expenses of running this Government, rather than borrowing it to pay the Government's appropriation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield to me to answer the gentleman how it will help labor?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. China and India today have 700,000,000 people whose money does not permit them to buy anything from our country on account of the depreciation of silver. If we pass this bill, it will enable 700,000,000 Chinese and Indians to buy from us and will be instrumental in helping increase commodity prices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE] has again expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON].

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, although I hold views upon money that some on this side of the aisle would consider heretical, I shall not vote for this bill. When the President sought power to devalue the dollar by reducing its and content, I supported him, for I felt that there could be no doubt that the commodity price of gold had gotten out of line with the general price level, and that this misalinement, by sharply curtailing the buying power of the debtor segment of the population, blocked economic recovery. Devaluation did not bring all the benefits some expected, but it did lift the domestic prices of wheat, cotton, wool, copper, and those other commodities which find much of their outlet in foreign markets. Devaluation did not materially affect the prices of butter, eggs, pork, beef, mutton, and those other products whose market is almost wholly domestic. In my opinion, we shall have to take another step before devaluation can be reflected in higher prices for the latter class of commodities; we shall have to resume gold redemption, for so long as the currency with which goods are bought and sold in the domestic market is unredeemable, there is no relation between that currency and the theoretical, nonexistent, devalued gold dollar impounded in the Treasury. Devaluation influenced the domestic prices of export commodities because we are on a gold standard internationally—the devalued dollars are available for making international settlements. Devaluation has not, and by the nature of things cannot, influence the domestic prices of domestic products, because intranationally we are not on a gold basis.

Those who expect to raise the price level by passing this legislation are doomed to disappointment. The silver certificates to be issued against the silver deposited in the Treasury will have the same buying power as the paper dollars we use today. If they had more buying power, they would be hoarded; if they had less, they would drive our present currency into hoarding. In either event there would be a curtailment of the currency, when what the supporters of the bill want is expansion. The paper dollars to be issued under this bill will be worth neither more nor less than the existing dollars of commerce and hence will not raise the price level or make debts any easier to pay.

It has been argued that adding 1,312,000,000 ounces of silver to the metallic reserves of the country will increase the stability of its currency. I must challenge that statement. The fact is that for every dollar's worth of silver purchased there must be a dollar of currency issued; in other words, a dollar of Government obligation created. No man improves his net worth by increasing his assets and liabilities in the same amount, and I do not believe that nations are exempt from the kind of bookkeeping individuals must use. Arithmetic cannot be repealed.

Mr. Chairman, this bill does not provide for bimetallism, symmetallism, or free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, or any other ratio. This bill is not in the public interest. It is conceived in sectionalism and selfishness. It will benefit no one except silver miners and silver speculators. The former are entitled to the same consideration we accord to every other American industry; the latter have no claim upon the generosity they expect us to extend to them under this measure.

The claim that it is necessary to add to the metallic reserves of this country does not bear analysis. Our reserves are adequate. Against $10,097,413,078 in currency, we have $8,298,164,457 in gold and silver. Accepting the generally recognized principle that a nation can safely issue currency against a 40-percent reserve, the United States can issue more than $20,000,000,000 in currency—twice what we have issued. Surely that should satisfy the most enthusiastic inflationist. If more currency is needed—and I am not arguing that it is or is not—why not have it without increasing our reserves? Why spend 35 cents for silver for a fiat dollar, when a fiat dollar printed on a piece of paper worth a fraction of a cent will do as well? Why spend $800,000,000 for silver for additional reserves when our reserves are already twice what they need to be under sound monetary practice?

We cannot afford to spend $800,000,000 for 1,312,000,000 ounces of silver to be impounded in the vaults of the Treasury Building at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. That metal will be hidden underground; nobody will see it, nobody will care to see it. Nobody will want to carry it around—cartwheels do not fit modern purses. That metal will be sterile, locked up, useless. It will not add to the circulation of the country a single dollar we cannot issue without it. To tie up $800,000,000 of the Government's credit for unneeded silver is even worse than to spend it for unnecessary post offices and courthouses, for the latter have at least some utility. To exhaust the Government's buying power in piling up silver we do not need, at a time when schools are closed for lack of funds, is worse than folly. To strain the Nation's credit in the futile undertaking of filling the Treasury vaults with metal we shall not use, at a time when 20,000,000 people need food and when the greatest calamity in the history of the country, the drought in the Middle West, is bringing to our doors an unprecedented relief problem, should leave a sense of guilt.

Has anyone thought of the loss the Government might sustain in the event that there should be a decline in the value of the silver after we have acquired it? We know that from 1871 to 1931 the price of the white metal dropped from $1.25 to 30 cents an ounce. How do we know that it will not drop more? Eighty percent of the silver mined in the United States is a byproduct of copper, zinc, and lead, and the production of silver accordingly cannot be controlled. A resumption of industrial activity would yield a tremendously increased output of silver. There is no corresponding increase in demand for silver in the offing. Other nations have discontinued the monetary use of the metal, and any increased use in this country would hardly affect the world demand. Practically every European government demonetized silver in 1873, and India discontinued free coinage in 1893. Not only have all the commercial nations demonetized silver, but they have debased their subsidiary silver coin, thus removing one other source of demand for the white metal. Furthermore, less subsidiary coin is used, for people everywhere, except in China, have learned to trust and to prefer paper currency. Silver is no longer held as bank reserves to any extent outside of the United States, Great Britain, and India; and in those countries its use for that purpose has been greatly curtailed. Finally, the gap between production and consumption has been widened by the use of old or remelted silver in the arts and industries. All these tendencies and trends have operated to decrease the demand for silver, and I believe we should consider very carefully the possibility that after we have bought our hoard of it, it may become so reduced in value that we shall ultimately suffer a great loss.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] said something a few minutes ago about the necessity of stimulating trade with the 700,000,000 people who live in the Orient. I am as deeply interested as anyone in increasing our markets in Asia, but a careful study of the problem has convinced me that there is nothing in the present bill that will help. The argument to be inferred from the gentleman's statement is based upon the fallacious supposition that the countries of the Orient use silver to buy goods and commodities abroad. The contrary is the fact. The people of the Orient use the trade balance they create in exchanging their raw materials for our manufactured goods to acquire silver for hoarding. The purchasing power of Asia has not suffered from the low price of silver and would not be enhanced if an increase in the value of silver should result from this legislation. In that connection I wish to quote from a book the careful reading of which I would commend to the Members of the House—Silver: An Analysis of the Factors Affecting Its Price, written by Y. S. Leong and published by the Brookings Institution:

> Imports relative to exports tend to increase in physical volume when the price of silver is relatively low and to decrease when it is relatively high.

Accordingly, if this legislation should have the effect of increasing the price of silver, if this economist is right, it would have a depressing influence upon our trade with China, the advocates of this bill to the contrary notwithstanding.

Concerning the effect of the value of silver upon our trade with India, Dr. Leong says:

> Since the Indian currency act of 1927 the rupee has been tied to the pound sterling at the statutory value of 1s. 6d. A decline in the price of silver would, therefore, have no unfavorable effect on the purchasing power of India.

Would a higher price for silver help our trade with Mexico and Peru? These are admittedly important exporters of silver. Silver constitutes 31 percent of our imports from Mexico; but inasmuch as all our imports from Mexico constitute only 3 percent of our foreign trade, we could charge off all the trade resulting from the importation of silver from the Republic to the south and the net loss of business to the United States would be less than one-twentieth of 1 percent. Twelve percent of Peru's exports are silver, but Peru's foreign trade is too insignificant to mention, and we should not get much if by bidding up silver we got it all.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Minnesota, and in this time I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Reference was made to the exchange of business with India by purchasing Indian silver. Does not that mean that our good American money will take the place of their useless silver?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Why, certainly.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Michigan propounded an inquiry to the gentleman from Idaho as to how he proposed to get this money into the pockets of the people. May I suggest that one way would be to reelect a Democratic Congress?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The stimulation of domestic business that might result if this bill should accomplish its purpose of raising the price of silver would be negligible. I call attention to the fact that the income from the entire mineral industry of the United States is only 3 percent of the total national income, and that the income from the silver-mining industry is only 0.6 of 1 percent of the income of the mineral industry. So the utmost that we could expect would be such stimulation as would come from a slight increase in that part of the Nation's income which now constitutes 0.6 of 1 percent of 3 percent, or less than one-fiftieth of 1 percent. For the sake of the doubtful possibility of increasing infinitesimally one-fiftieth of 1 percent of the national income, you would throw $300,000,000 of the hard-earned money of the American people into a stupendous gamble. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ELTSE].

Mr. ELTSE of California. Mr. Chairman, I confess I do not know much about this bill, but at the same time I believe I know almost as much about it as any other Member on the floor of the House. I asked two or three members of the Committee on Ways and Means if they were going to make an address or give a talk on this bill, and they said no; that they did not know enough about it to talk about the bill.

In this connection I am reminded of what happened at the special session of Congress last spring, when some of the bills that were passed were not even read by the Members of the House and were not even printed. This Congress, this House of Representatives of the United States of America, is becoming the laughing-stock of the people of the Nation, and it is for just exactly that reason that we are being held in disrespect; and the more of this that takes place, the greater we will be held in disrespect. We have a government by dictum today. These bills are prepared at the other end of the Avenue, sent to the House, and we are told to pass them; and in many instances we do not know the contents of the bills.

Not long ago I overheard two Members of the House on the right-hand side of the aisle talking. I was not eavesdropping but I was riding up in the elevator with them. I heard one say to the other, "If we do not pass a silver bill in this Congress, I just as well not run at the primary election this fall." That gentleman came from a silver-producing State; and his colleague said, "Well, I am in the same boat."

I point this out for the reason that the origin of this bill and for the companion bill in the Senate is to be found in the silver-producing States and comes from the Representatives and Senators of the silver-producing States and the silver speculators of the United States. There may be something in what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] said about the origin of this bill. If I am a correct reader of the press reports, the President himself opposes any silver legislation in this Congress. I hold in my hand a sheaf of newspaper clippings taken as far back as the beginning of this regular session, and they all indicate that the President opposes the passage of silver legislation by this Congress. He does not want it, but he has been forced into the position of authorizing the passage of this bill or requesting the passage of this bill, and I do not believe that it is his desire that the bill be passed at the present time.

I happen to be an attorney at law, and I know the practice before courts of law. If any court in the United States, under a democratic form of government, would conduct a case as the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee were conducted, it would be a travesty on justice. There was no testimony before that committee by experts or anyone versed in monetary or silver legislation except representatives or witnesses called by those on the committee who favored the bill, and they cannot qualify as experts. The minority members of the committee asked and desired to have witnesses called in order that this question might be thoroughly discussed and thoroughly threshed out. What did they meet with? They met with resistance. The majority members did not want to learn the facts or to learn the extent to which this legislation might affect the standing of the country as a whole.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELTSE of California. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman is not a member of the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. ELTSE of California. No; but I am a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman was not present at any hearings before the Ways and Means Committee and is mistaken in what he is talking about in the statements he has made.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. ELTSE of California. In answer to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] I may say that I had the intelligence to read the report and I found out there what happened. I also read the minority report, which expressly states just exactly what I have said, that the opportunity was not afforded to call witnesses who stood in opposition to the passage of the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I may say to the gentleman that he is entirely mistaken. The hearings were open to anybody who wanted to be there and they did not appear.

Mr. ELTSE of California. And an executive session was ordered in the beginning.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman is just mistaken.

Mr. ELTSE of California. I will let the record speak for itself; and have long since learned that those who respond in anger and heat usually are themselves mistaken and later have cause to regret their words.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] ought to castigate the gentleman from California to the extent that he has. I will take that question up when I speak a little later.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California who has just preceded me has indulged in what to my mind is clearly a series of contradictions. In the beginning he tells us this is a Government by a dictator, that bills are written down yonder at the other end of the Avenue and sent up here and we have to accept them. Then in the conclusion of his speech he displayed to us newspaper clippings which purported to say that the President was against this bill, and then the gentleman wound up by saying we forced it on the President.

Mr. ELTSE of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield for a question, but not for a statement.

Mr. ELTSE of California. Where did the bill come from?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I may say to the gentleman that in my opinion it grew out of the crime perpetrated in 1873 by the Republican Party which demonetized silver. May I also say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] who professes to be against this bill because he has discovered that the Secretary of the Republican National Committee is speculating in silver, and some other gentlemen for that matter, that the gentleman from Minnesota has purported to be a strong advocate of the Fiesinger bill. I think the gentleman from Ohio will bear me out in that statement, and yet under the Fiesinger bill the men who have speculated in silver would make four or five times as much as they can make under this bill, so I take it his arguments are not exactly sound.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I say to the gentleman that I have not even read the Fiesinger bill; consequently I do not know what it is about, and therefore I cannot be for something I do not know anything about.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] tells me the gentleman from Minnesota was favorable to silver legislation.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have not authorized the gentleman from Texas to speak for me, and the gentleman is in error when he quotes me to that effect.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I wonder if the gentleman from Minnesota has read this bill?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I have read the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I will quote a good authority. I quote the gentleman from Minnesota. He said that he was for a bimetallic base for the currency and there is not any way that you can write a bill authorizing bimetallism that will not offer more of an opportunity for speculation than this bill here offers.

I was surprised that you could write a law that would limit the possibility of speculation to such a narrow base as is set out in this bill.

There has been a lot of argument about sound money. The best definition I ever heard of sound money is that the currency to be sound must be reasonably stable in its purchasing power and of sufficient volume to meet the needs of the people. The currency we have had in this country meets none of these tests. In 1926 it was worth a dollar, in 1929 it was worth 50 cents. In 1932 it was over $2, and now they say we have devalued it until its purchasing power is a little over one dollar and a half.

This measure represents a distinct victory, as the gentleman from Oregon has said, in some small measure at least, for those who belong to the quantitative school of thought.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. Our platform, in 1932, states, among other things, that we advocate an international monetary conference called on the invitation of our Government to consider the rehabilitation of silver and related questions.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. That is all correct, but what I am interested in is a currency for the people of this country, and there is not any question in my mind but what one of the chief contributing forces back of this depression has been the incapacity of our money base to take care of the business needs of this country, and the President of the United States recognized this the other day when he sent his message to us, because one of the things he says in that message is:

> As a part of the larger objective, some things have been clear. One is that we should move forward as rapidly as conditions permit in broadening the metallic base of our monetary system and in stabilizing the purchasing and debt-paying power of our money on a more equitable level.

At another place in his message he says:

> We seek to remedy a maladjustment of our currency.

And this bill, taking it at its worst, is at least one step in the general direction of broadening the monetary base until it will support our business structure.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of the time.

Mr. Chairman, let me clear up one or two little matters here before I take up any discussion of the merits of the bill, if I can discuss the merits. It actually only contains demerits. I do not pretend to know anything about it, so perhaps I cannot discuss either its merits or demerits. Something was said during the remarks of the gentleman from California about the procedure in the Ways and Means Committee.

I uphold the statement that the gentleman from California made as being a correct one. The exact situation is this: Much to my astonishment, when we went into the hearing, which was last Friday morning, the doors of the committee room were locked. We had been informed the Secretary of the Treasury was to be there and he was present. There was no official reporter there or any press representatives, and I turned to the chairman and asked him if we were not to have an open hearing on account of the presence of the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury. The clerk of the committee turned to us and said, "I understood this was to be more or less of an executive session." I inquired what "more or less of an executive session" meant. You either have an executive session or you have an open one. I do not know what a "more or less" one is, but these are exactly the words that passed in the committee.

As a result of the objection the members of the minority and myself raised, the session was opened to the public and a stenographer was sent for. One was not present during the time of this colloquy, but he was there when we were in open session. Therefore the gentleman from California is correct in the statement he made in reference to the manner in which this bill was taken up.

Mr. Chairman, once more the minority are placed in the position of having to object to the haste with which administration measures are rushed through committees and through the House, without adequate consideration, and without attempting to get information upon the issues involved. This is supposed to be a legislative body, but when the White House sends down a ready-prepared bill with its stamp of approval upon it, ratification by the House becomes a mere formality. In times of great emergency, such procedure may be excusable, but certainly no one will claim that the pending bill comes within the category of emergency legislation.

All that is necessary to start the legislative machinery in high gear is for the fact to become known that a particular bill is an administration measure. With that assurance, the subservient Democratic majority are saved the trouble of determining how they shall vote. Like the Light Brigade at Balaklava—

> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do and die.

This bill is one of the most important measures to come before the Congress this session. It contemplates a complete and drastic change of national policy by reviving the principles underlying the Sherman Silver Purchase Act, of unhappy and ill-fated memory. Its effect upon the economic welfare of our people may be profound and far-reaching. Yet the majority of the committee did not feel it necessary to secure information upon both sides of this important question. They were not even willing to go as far as the justice of the peace who, while admitting that his mind was already made up in favor of the plaintiff, was willing to hear the defendant's side of the case.

When I inquired at the hearing whether there would be any opposition witnesses I was told by the Chair that it was not the purpose to have a debate upon the silver question, but merely to secure an explanation of the bill. In other words, the minds of the Democratic members were foreclosed upon the policy of the bill, and they neither wanted any information themselves upon the issues presented by this legislation, nor did they want the minority to have any.

I want now to draw a comparison between the manner in which this hearing was conducted and some other hearings before our committee in years gone by.

I happened to be a member of the committee in 1922. The Secretary of State at that time was the present Chief Justice of the United States, Mr. Hughes. The Ways and Means Committee called for some information from the State Department relative to a loan to Liberia. We had had the subordinates before us. So we asked the Secretary to appear, and the very next morning the Secretary of State came before the Ways and Means Committee. While it was contrary to his own judgment and contrary to his party's policy, he advocated a loan to Liberia in 1922, because Mr. Wilson, in his time as President and during the war, had promised it to them. The Secretary of State made such an elaborate appeal that he convinced every member of the Committee of the justness and fairness of the loan, although the night before every one of us had been against it. I just offer this as a comparison of the way in which hearings can be conducted.

Last Friday morning, when the open hearing started, the Secretary of the Treasury said he had no statement to make; that he understood we were to have an executive session and he was there to answer questions. A few questions were asked him, and immediately he informed us that he would ask us to hear his subordinate, the General Counsel of the Treasury Department, Mr. Oliphant. I asked the Secretary before he left the stand one or two questions which have not yet been answered, which appear on page 11 of the hearings; and, by the way, we only got the hearings this morning, you know:

> Mr. TREADWAY. * * * What does the administration expect to accomplish by the bill? Why is the administration asking Congress to pass this legislation at this time?
> Secretary MORGENTHAU. Mr. Chairman, if it is agreeable to you, may I suggest that Mr. Oliphant make a statement giving an interpretation of the bill as a whole, which would cover the point the gentleman has in mind.

At this point Mr. Oliphant, the General Counsel of the Treasury Department, took the stand, and the Secretary was excused. He was directed to answer my question, which he did by reciting section 2 of the bill, which is the declaration of policy. What I wanted to know was, "Why change the policy? What do you expect to accomplish by it?"

That inquiry has to this day not been answered. There has been no explanation of the reason of the policy laid down in section 2 of the bill before you. That is the difference between the manner in which hearings were conducted in the past and in the present day under the present administration.

Later on in the hearings the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COCHRAN] tried to get some information from the witness along the line of my inquiry. Mr. Oliphant's answer to him was:

I know I am not being very helpful, and I am sure I will be less helpful on general questions of policy. I know something about the drafting of the bill and how it was worked out, and I will be glad to answer any questions about that and give any facts I have.

Just before, the gentleman from Pennsylvania had asked:

Mr. COCHRAN. * * * What is the necessity for changing the policy?

To this Mr. Oliphant replied:

Mr. OLIPHANT. It seems to me that that is a type of policy under our form of government that it is the business of Congress to decide.

Still later during his testimony I returned to the same question, and again the witness evaded it, saying that it was for Congress to decide. Yet, when the question came before the Ways and Means Committee, the majority members did not bother themselves about deciding this great question. They took the change for granted.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Of course, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Has the gentleman read the President's message?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly I have.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. And did not the gentleman get from the President's message the purpose of the bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. I cannot see where the President states why he set up this policy, and I do not think the gentleman from Washington can. He does not show the necessity for this subsidy to silver. He states that we should move forward as rapidly as possible in broadening the metallic base of our monetary system, but he does not say why. That is the very issue here. He makes the assumption that the base should be broadened, as if there were no question but what this is the proper course to pursue. He states that we must not neglect the value of an increased use of silver in improving our monetary system, but he does not say how the use of silver will improve it.

Now, where did we get with Mr. Oliphant? By the way, I want to say this about Mr. Oliphant: He is the only expert we had appear before the committee in the day and a half hearing, but can he qualify as an expert on silver? He did admit that he wrote the bill. It is a little confusing. Mr. DIES takes credit for writing the bill and introducing it. But, nevertheless, throughout the day Mr. Oliphant admitted that he wrote the bill.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I do not think that Mr. DIES made any such claim.

Mr. TREADWAY. All right. Let it go at that. I think Mr. DIES knows more about the subject than Mr. Oliphant does. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Oliphant—and he is within the sound of my voice—qualified as an expert. He has been a professor of law, he has taught the young students how to sprout. He came here under the Farm Credit Administration, and then he went to the Treasury as counsel. There is your qualification as an expert on silver legislation. If I was going to look up an expert in medicine or in engineering or in law or in business, I would take a man who had had some experience in that line.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. No. I have such a short time—I admit that I do not know anything about the bill, and nobody has told us anything about the bill in the whole course of this debate.

Mr. Oliphant was clever; he said he was the author of the mechanics of the bill that was set up, but when it comes to the policy we would have to ask those higher up.

In the meantime Mr. Morgenthau had left the room—he left as soon as Mr. Oliphant took the stand. There was no one there to tell us where the policy came from that brought forth this doubtful but wonderful piece of legislation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is it fair to the people of the country that a brandnew policy should be adopted in so rapid a movement as this?

The President's message was received Tuesday, May 22. On Wednesday, May 23, the bill was introduced in the House by Mr. DIES. On Friday, May 25, hearings were begun, and on Saturday, May 26, hearings were closed at about 4 p.m. Immediately after the close of the hearing an executive session of the committee was promptly called, at which there were present but 7 of the 25 members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Few members, apparently, had any intimation that there was to be a meeting of that nature. I was not present at the meeting, but I am informed that there was not even any discussion of whether the change in national policy contemplated by the bill was proper or expedient. The minds of the majority members must have been foreclosed upon the bill at the outset, because they proceeded at once to the consideration of a few technical amendments to the bill suggested by the administration, and after a session lasting only a few minutes the bill was favorably reported.

Today is the 30th, just 8 days since this tremendous change in the monetary policy was first introduced into Congress, with the President's message, and we are asked to railroad this bill through tonight. The bill comes before the House after this brief consideration by the Ways and Means Committee, and I am unable to see how the majority Members can possibly feel qualified to explain or defend the bill. I, for one, do not feel competent to discuss the relative merits of the measure without hearing testimony upon both sides of the question.

Mr. Chairman, representative government has gone by, and all we have now is a rubber-stamp type of government for anything that bears the word "administration." I am sorry for you Democrats that have to go along with anything that is earmarked "administration."

But let us get to these money changers. We heard a whole lot about the money changers a year ago, and if there was ever an opportunity for money changing, it is in the silver exchange in New York City today. We do not hear so much of the expression today, but there are some money changers operating in the speculative markets of the country today under the program of the Democratic administration.

Mr. KELLER. And we are not done yet.

Mr. TREADWAY. You will have more of it just as soon as the "brain trust" can think up something more.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Does the gentleman want me to refer to India again? I answered him about India.

Mr. SIROVICH. I want to ask the gentleman whether all the members of the Committee on Ways and Means were notified to be present at that meeting.

Mr. TREADWAY. We had no notice of an executive session; only of the hearing. I asked not to have an executive session on Saturday afternoon, but the hurry of the administration was so great that that request was not granted.

Mr. SIROVICH. The gentleman says that seven members were present.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank you, Doctor. I want now to refer to another matter.

Mr. ELTSE of California. It is very much like the Gold Reserve Act that was put through.

Mr. TREADWAY. But that did not bear the same amount of profit to the money changers. They figure in this bill because the President has had to compromise with them. He has not been able to keep them out, and they insist upon sticking their noses under the tent.

Even Mr. DIES admits there will be a profit to the people in this. Why, these 4 hours of debate are wasted. If you are in such a hurry, why have 4 hours' debate on this subject? There are not four men in this House—with all due respect to my associates—who understand this measure, its complications, or its implications. I will say, however, that Mr. DIES is one of those four. Mr. LUCE and Mr. DIES understand the subject of silver, and the rest of us go along. Most of you go along because the President has had to compromise with the silver people of the Congress.

While the President ostensibly is sponsoring this legislation, he has done so only to throw a sop to the silverites and inflationists. The press has carried stories for months about how the silver group has been plaguing the White House for silver legislation. Under the Thomas amendment to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the President already has discretionary authority to remonetize silver at such ratio as he may fix, and in pursuance of that authority he is now buying the entire output of the domestic mines at a price 20 cents above the world price. The silver group and the inflationists are not satisfied with the President's limited exercise of his discretionary powers. They want mandatory silver legislation.

Already this session the House has passed a bill for the sale of American agricultural products in exchange for foreign silver at a valuation 25 percent above the actual value of the metal. Other bills are pending which provide for the restoration of bimetallism at the ratio of 16 to 1, for the purchase of one and one-half billion ounces of silver, and so on. The present bill provides for a subsidy for silver producers and at the same time will bring about a handsome profit for silver speculators by requiring the ultimate purchase of 1,300,000,000 ounces of domestic and foreign silver. When purchased, such silver will be used as a basis for the issuance of silver certificates, which will dilute our currency and thus bring satisfaction to the inflationists.

The present holdings of free silver are largely in the hands of speculators, as is evidenced by the publication as a Senate document of a list of persons, firms, and corporations owning as of January 1, 1934, either spot silver or futures contracts. This list was reprinted in the hearings on the pending bill. Among the large holders is the Chase National Bank, which owns more than 17,000,000 ounces of spot silver and has a large number of futures contracts, both long and short. The National City Bank also has large holdings and numerous contracts. Among the largest individual holders is E. L. Cord, the motor magnate, who is shown to own a million and three-quarters ounces of spot silver in addition to having several contracts.

It may or may not be significant that one of the holders of a futures contract is William Jennings Bryan, Jr., the son of the late exponent of 16 to 1. One holder gives his address as 422 Senate Office Building, a room assigned to Senator WHEELER, of Montana, one of the silver advocates.

It is the purpose of this bill, among other things, to enhance the price of silver by Government purchase. The speculators in silver have had this or similar legislation in mind for some time. They expect to make a profit out of the artificial stimulus which this bill will give to silver prices. It is true that the bill levies a tax of 50 percent upon the profit thus derived, but half a loaf to the speculators is better than none.

It is quite possible that with respect to transfers of silver taking place before the effective date of the act the Government will be powerless to collect a tax. Those drafting the bill were keen enough to realize this when they made the tax applicable, in the conjunctive, first to transfers made on or after the effective date of the act and, secondly, to transfers made between May 15, 1934, and prior to the effective date of the act. Thus, if the second provision is held unconstitutional, the tax would still apply to transfers made after the enactment of the act. It will be recalled that in a case involving the gift tax under the 1924 Revenue Act the Supreme Court held the tax unconstitutional with respect to all gifts made before the enactment of that act. The pending bill is, of course, retroactive to May 15.

When the Government took over all the gold in the country and revalued the dollar, the President declared that the profit thus resulting should belong to the people. Why should not the same principle be applied to silver? Why give the speculators any of the profit which is to come entirely from the artificial increase in the price of silver as a result of this bill?

Now, as to the inflationary features of the measure before us. The Democratic Party, in its platform, stood for a "sound currency to be preserved at all hazards." The President reiterated this policy in his campaign speeches. He insisted that President Hoover's reference to the narrow escape which this country had from going off the gold standard in 1932 was a "libel on the credit of the United States." He said that the Republican charge that if he were elected we would have "rubber dollars" was a "misrepresentation." And yet soon after he took office, we went off the gold standard, and later our dollar was depreciated to 59 cents. Now he seeks to further undermine the Nation's money by flooding the country with silver certificates.

While, as I have previously said, I do not feel competent to argue the merits or demerits of the proposed legislation from the standpoint of its effect upon the welfare of our people, I do recall that President Cleveland once had a great deal to say about the silver question, and other speakers will doubtless refer to his position.

During the hearings I made a motion that the committee invite Dr. Edwin W. Kemmerer, an outstanding authority upon the money question, to be present Saturday morning to give his views upon the bill. This motion was lost on a strict party vote; but late Friday afternoon, when it became apparent that a Saturday session would be necessary to hear the sponsor of the bill, Mr. DIES, the minority were told that if Dr. Kemmerer were present the following morning he would be heard. This was at 4:30 o'clock Friday afternoon. Of course, at that late hour, it could hardly be expected that an out-of-town witness could arrange to be present the next day. However, I immediately sent a telegram to Dr. Kemmerer, at Princeton University. He could not be reached at the University, being out of the city on a western trip. At this point, I will include the telegram which I received from him in response to my invitation.

PRINCETON, N.J., May 26, 1934.

The Honorable ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
Member of Congress:

Just arrived home from western trip. Delayed receipt of telegram prevents acceptance invitation. Sailing Europe next week. My opinion concerning broadening monetary base by using silver given briefly in recent book, Kemmerer on Money, especially last half chapter 7; also interview New York Sun, May 24, and resolution opposing silver measures before Congress recently issued by executive committee of Economists National Committee on Monetary Policy. A more detailed statement is given in my testimony of March 25, 1932, before House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

E. W. KEMMERER.

At this point I should like to quote briefly from the resolution referred to by Dr. Kemmerer in his telegram, which was inserted in the Senate proceedings of May 22, and also in the hearings upon this bill. The executive committee of the Economists National Committee on Monetary Policy is composed of a group of brilliant economists, including Dr. Kemmerer, Dr. Oliver M. W. Sprague, Dr. Harold L. Reed, and others, who have given much study to the money question. I quote the following from their statement:

This committee believes that the lessons of monetary history and the principles of money should have an important place in the consideration of monetary legislation in this country and, therefore, desires to express the following convictions:

1. That no additional silver should be purchased at any price.
2. That the purchase of silver bullion at artificial prices will not promote sound currency, but on the contrary will add to the liabilities of the Government and reduce confidence in the Nation's currency.
3. That restoration of bimetallism at the market ratio would cause national injury and retard recovery.
4. That the restoration of bimetallism at the ratio of 16 to 1 would be a national calamity.
5. That a rise in the price of silver benefits materially neither domestic industry nor the foreign trade of the United States.

I also wish to quote from the article in the New York Sun, referred to by Dr. Kemmerer, the following synopsis of the interview with him:

"The administration's latest program of doing something more for silver is one more step down the inflation path, weakening confidence in the dollar and wasting millions of dollars in the purchase of useless, dead silver at a time when other nations are selling, not buying, and in a depression when there is a large Government deficit", declared Prof. Edwin Walter Kemmerer, Walker professor of international finance at Princeton and noted monetary authority, in an interview with a Sun reporter here today. Professor Kemmerer was on his way to speak on sound money in Indianapolis.

At this point I will quote a brief extract from chapter VII of Dr. Kemmerer's recent book, Kemmerer on Money, to which he also referred in his telegram. Referring to what he termed the "precipitous and drastic" silver legislation of 1933, Dr. Kemmerer said:

In May the silver provisions of the Thomas amendment to the Agricultural Adjustment Act became law. They authorized the President himself to fix a coinage ratio between gold and silver and "to provide for the unlimited coinage of such gold and silver at the ratio so fixed." This was bimetallism pure and simple, despite the fact that the amendment said that a gold dollar should be the "standard unit of value." It was left entirely to the decision of the President whether a bimetallic standard should be adopted, and, if adopted, whether it should be national or international bimetallism.

Thus, with very little debate in Congress and with almost no public discussion outside, full authority was suddenly given to one man to commit a nation of 123,000,000 people to a bimetallic standard at a time when no such standard had existed in the world for approximately 60 years. And this was done despite the facts: (1) That two generations ago nation after nation had deliberately discarded bimetallism after having given it a fair trial; and (2) that after a quarter of a century of subsequent agitation throughout the world for a return to bimetallism—an agitation accompanied by a number of international conferences and by two heated political campaigns in the United States centering upon it—bimetallism was everywhere defeated and had almost been forgotten, both in the United States and Europe, for a third of a century.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I want to again point out that this monstrosity of legislation began with a message from the President on May 22, involving a drastic change of policy on the part of this Government, and is being passed in the House by a rubber-stamp majority within 9 days from its introduction. It is the culmination of the vicious method of legislating which we have witnessed here since the beginning of the present administration. It is being enacted through the most flagrant abuse of legislative power that has ever been heard of.

Government by the people has practically ceased to exist. Government by a group of theorists and impractical and uninformed individuals is running rampant. The only way a halt will be called is by an uprising of the people. I do not favor revolutions, but I do favor what is going to be a revolution at the polls next November.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the remainder of the time. I also ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I respectfully request that I be not interrupted during the course of my remarks. The present bill conforms to and carries out the recommendation of the President of the United States made in his message to the Congress on the 22d day of this month. I shall not have time to make a complete, full, or connected argument or statement with respect to the bill in the short time remaining, and I confess I do not claim to be an expert in financial or economic matters. First, however, I desire to make a few observations and comments relative to the committee's consideration of this bill, since the discussion now seems to revolve around the treatment accorded the minority, and the manner in which the hearings were conducted. We all know that the President, on the 22d of this month, sent Congress a special message; that the silver question has been discussed in both branches of Congress and in the press of the country ever since Congress convened. In fact, the money question is one of the age-old questions with which we have had to deal. There was ample notice, therefore, given to all Members of Congress, and especially the members of the Ways and Means Committee, that this matter would be considered. When the bill was introduced in the Senate carrying a tax provision, we all knew that, under the Constitution, that body did not have jurisdiction over revenue legislation. Therefore the bill was introduced in the House on Thursday the 24th, and on the 25th the committee began consideration of the bill. Ample notice certainly was given.

There was the 22d, the 23d, the 24th, and 25th—5 days from the time the President's message was received by the Congress to the time the hearings were concluded. When the Dies bill, which is now before this body, was referred to our committee, no one, to my knowledge, suggested that we hold public hearings. No request was made to me as chairman of the committee that any witness be called or any public or open hearings be held until the morning of the 25th of May. I challenge anyone to dispute that statement. There had been a suggestion, however, by some member of the committee, a majority member, as I recall, that we should have someone from the Treasury Department before the committee to explain the bill. The minority members knew such hearing was to be conducted. If they were so anxious to have public hearings and have additional witnesses, why did not some of them communicate that desire to me as chairman of the community? I endeavored to be fair, and I do not believe any minority member of the committee will say that I have not been just as fair to the minority as chairman of this committee as I have to the majority.

The Secretary of the Treasury was there, and the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], a most estimable gentleman as well as a useful and valuable member of the Ways and Means Committee, came in and raised the question about whether we were to have open hearings or meet in executive session. Nobody had said anything about public hearings or calling any witnesses. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] never had suggested that he had any witness in mind that he wanted called; never intimated such a thing, although he had had 4 days in which to do so, but he saw an opportunity to play penurious politics. That is what took place. There was no executive session demanded by any member of the committee. I said:

If open hearings are desired, bring the witness you want to be heard, and it is perfectly agreeable to the majority members of the committee to hear him.

We opened the door at the suggestion, not the demand, and the members of the press and the stenographer were called in, and hearings were conducted in open session for 2 days. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] began to talk about calling a witness and asked if the minority could call some witnesses in opposition to the bill. The chairman said:

Certainly, if you will have your witness here before we conclude the hearing, so that we will not have to delay reporting out this bill.

We all knew then, as we know now, that it was late in the session; and if this legislation was to be enacted, we could not delay it day after day. He suggested some gentleman by the name of Kemmerer, I believe, who possibly was an expert on financial matters, and asked if we would call him. The chairman said, "We will not call anybody to come and testify; but if the minority members desire to call him, they may do so." It was understood he would be invited to appear and would be heard.

Now, is the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] willing to say that with all the Members of this House, members of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and members of the Committee on Banking and Currency, men who have specialized in matters of finance, that none of them were qualified to come and testify? The gentleman did not call one of them. Here in Washington are representatives of the United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, and the American Bankers Association, who usually testify on matters of this character. Not one of them appeared. No request was made to appear. None of them appeared, not a single witness; not a single witness from either branch of Congress, not a single living soul in the United States had enough interest in opposing this legislation to request to be heard.

The gentleman from Massachusetts only had one expert, who it turned out had recently testified before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and that testimony was available and could have been embodied as a part of the hearings had it been so desired. Moreover, this expert is now represented as being the apostle of the gold standard, while only a few years ago he was known as an extreme silverite. He is the only witness ever suggested, and we gave them ample time to secure his appearance.

We called the committee to report the bill out; and now they say they requested it be postponed. The gentleman asked me if it was my purpose to call the committee in executive session and report the bill out. I told him that unless there were witnesses present desiring to be heard I intended to do so, as we wanted to report this bill as soon as we could. I called an executive meeting of the committee on Saturday afternoon, which the gentleman from Massachusetts did not attend. Prior to the executive meeting the committee further listened to the able presentation of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], and the doctrine was so sound and his statements were so convincing that the gentleman from Massachusetts, perhaps fearful he would be converted, absented himself from the committee room.

When the time came to report the bill, he was not present. It was his duty to be there. I had told everyone who had mentioned it that we would go into executive session at the conclusion of the hearings. Every member of the minority was gone except one. Two of the minority members said to me, "I will leave my vote with you. Vote to report the bill out." They knew the vote was going to be taken. They changed their minds subsequently, however, as they had a right to do, and signed the minority report.

Now, my friends, what about this report? You can search the archives of this Government, both ancient and modern, and I challenge anyone to find a counterpart to this minority report. I have never read anything like it. After setting out their grievances they boldly confess that they do not know anything about the bill. Let me read the last paragraph of the minority report:

> In view of the lack of information upon the bill, the minority are not prepared to enter into a discussion of the merits of the proposed legislation.

The gentleman who just preceded me, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], has said it was an involved bill, and his mind could not comprehend it. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], able Representative as he is, can understand when he wants to understand. There are none so blind as those who will not see; none so deaf as those who will not hear; none so stupid as those who close their minds against understanding. [Applause.]

The statement is made in the minority report that the Democratic majority is nothing but a rubber-stamp in the hands of the administration. My friends, I would rather be a rubber-stamp and have something to register, something to record, than to be a rubber-stamp and follow this minority report which contains nothing but ciphers and decimal points. That is all it contains, not a word of information.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mrs. KAHN. We on the minority side are very anxious to have the gentleman explain the bill. Will the gentleman kindly explain the bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Has the gentlewoman from California read the President's message?

Mrs. KAHN. I have read the President's message.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Has the gentlewoman read the hearings?

Mrs. KAHN. I have read the hearings.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If the gentlewoman has read the President's message, if she has read the hearings, and if she has read the very able and illuminating statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], and has read the report she should know something about what is in the bill.

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not yield further; I only have a few minutes remaining.

Mrs. KAHN. I should like to have some information as to the effect of the bill. I have read the hearings; I have read the entire list of the speculators in silver and have noted among them the name of William Jennings Bryan, Jr.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further. If the gentlewoman, having read the bill, the hearings, and the report, cannot understand it, I could never enlighten her on the subject.

So much for the manner in which the bill was considered. Now, I ask the gentlewoman from California to listen to one paragraph of the President's message, for it will enlighten her to some extent on the purposes of this legislation. The President said:

> As a part of the larger objective, some things have been clear. One is that we should move forward as rapidly as conditions permit in broadening the metallic base of our monetary system and in stabilizing the purchasing and debt-paying power of our money on a more equitable level. Another is that we should not neglect the value of an increased use of silver in improving our monetary system. Since 1929 that has been obvious.

Does that declaration of policy and statement of purpose enlighten the gentlewoman from California?

Mrs. KAHN. I did not ask about policy; I asked about effect.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Well, we shall have to wait to see what the effect is. [Laughter.] I do not claim to be a prophet, but we all know the beneficent effects of the enactment of the Gold Reserve Act and the other acts enacted to carry out the President's recovery program.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I am sure the chairman of the committee will recall that the President's message definitely stated that this silver legislation is a part of the monetary program of the administration, which was contemplated at the time the Gold Reserve Act was passed; and I am sure the chairman will also recall that the spokesman of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, to whom the minority members of the committee referred with such great pride, said that the mistake made was that the country did not go off the gold standard 2 years before it did.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is true; and that appeals to every open-minded person. I may say to my good friend from Tennessee that every Member on the majority side knows and realizes that it is useless to cast pearls of information before the blind. It is absolutely futile, and I for one shall not waste time in such futile efforts.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation is in accord with and carries out the recommendations contained in President Roosevelt's message to Congress on the 22d of this month. The enactment of this measure will constitute another step in the recovery program by providing an improved monetary system for this country. Its enactment will likewise open world markets for the products of American agriculture, industry, and labor. It will raise commodity prices and accelerate business. It will enable the debtor class to meet their obligations.

It has been the consistent policy of this administration to further recovery through an expansion of our foreign markets, and the enactment of this measure is but another step to that end.

The enactment of this measure will also pave the way for international cooperation in aid of general world recovery, and the promotion of better means of exchange among the nations of the world, and will redound to the benefit of this country, both in increased foreign trade and in the stabilization of the dollar in our country.

At the London Conference all the leading nations agreed that the policy of debasing their silver money was disastrous to world trade because that policy tended to reduce commodity prices in two ways, (1) by reducing the price of silver, which is in itself an important commodity in international trade, and (2) by diminishing the quantity of silver capable of being used in international exchange, and as a circulating medium in the countries using silver.

World stabilization of silver, which was sought to be obtained at the London Conference, and which this measure will further, by providing not only for taking the surplus silver off the world markets, but also by its use as a monetary reserve, will increase the price of silver, thereby stabilizing the price of the dollar here and abroad and make it possible for countries producing silver and silver-using countries like Mexico and the Orient to purchase more of our products. At the present time, those countries producing silver, the silver-using countries, owing to the low value of their silver, are unable to purchase the commodities they would otherwise purchase if the value of their silver was enhanced.

The terms of this measure declares it to be the policy of the United States to increase the proportion of silver to gold in its monetary stocks so as to have one-fourth silver and three-fourths gold, thereby making a greater use of silver in the public interest, and in further aid of the policy initiated by President Roosevelt in his proclamation of December 21, 1933, bringing our newly mined silver into the Treasury, as well as placing our country among the first to carry out the agreement on silver which we sought and secured at the London Conference.

The percentage of silver to gold in our monetary stocks has varied considerably during the past half century. In 1884 silver constituted 32.3 percent of our total monetary stocks of gold and silver; 40.3 percent in 1890; 55.8 percent in 1895; 41.9 percent in 1900; 30.9 percent in 1910; 27.8 percent in 1915. From 1920 to 1933 it remained practically stationary around 16 percent, and on April 30 of this year, following the enactment of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 and the devaluation of the gold dollar, silver constituted only 10.5 percent of our monetary stocks of gold and silver.

This measure, as I have previously stated, simply declares that it shall be the policy of this country to increase the proportion of silver to gold in its monetary stocks so that it will constitute 25 percent, which is much lower than in former years, as I have heretofore shown.

We are told by those opposing this measure that we are providing an unsound money, fiat or printing-press money. If this be true, what kind of money did we have in 1900 under President McKinley when silver constituted 41.9 percent of our monetary stocks of gold and silver; and in 1905 under President Theodore Roosevelt when silver represented 33.6 percent; and in 1910 under President Taft when it was 30.9 percent? If our money was sound then, when the percentage of silver to gold was much greater than this measure proposes, how can it be termed unsound money now?

While the enactment of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 constituted a step in improving our financial and monetary system and laid the foundation upon which we are building a currency system that will be both sound and adequate, we should not neglect the value of silver and its increased use in improving our monetary system. Silver is a valuable component of any monetary system; and with a proper proportion of silver in our monetary stocks, we may look to a coordinated use of that silver to check the fluctuation in the purchasing power of the dollar.

This bill authorizes the purchase of silver and the issuance of silver certificates to an amount paid for such silver. A limitation is placed on the price to be paid for silver situated in the United States on May 1, 1934, at not to exceed 50 cents an ounce.

The administration and your committee were unwilling to permit a limited few to take advantage of legislative governmental action to enrich themselves at the expense of the Nation and the public welfare; and in addition to placing a limit on the price that the Government could pay for such silver now in the hands of speculators, an additional provision is incorporated in the bill levying a 50-percent tax on the profits derived by such speculators. These two safeguards are contained in the bill to thwart the avarice and the greed of those who, foreseeing the logical and necessary steps required to bring about further recovery and a more sound and substantial monetary system, sought to take advantage of the Nation. Without such provisions, the policy of equitably reimbursing the Government for the increase which its action will ultimately bring to the price of silver could easily be obstructed. Hoarders of silver are thus allowed only a profit that might reasonably be expected from investments made for industrial uses.

Prior to the enactment of the Emergency Banking Act, banks were closing daily, impounding the life savings of our people. Banks were failing at such an alarming rate that drastic measures were necessary to prevent utter economic ruin.

Bank failures

Year	National	State	Total
1928	57	442	499
1929	64	595	659
1930	161	1,191	1,352
1931	409	1,885	2,294
1932	276	1,180	1,456
1933	66	396	462

The figures for 1933 are only up to and including March 4, at which time President Roosevelt declared the national banking holiday, which more than any other act brought about a restoration of confidence to our people and dissipated their fears as to the future. The action of President Roosevelt in declaring a national banking holiday inaugurated the new-deal program of recovery and demonstrated to the country the character of leadership so sorely needed to bring order out of chaos. During 1934 there have been no national bank failures, and since the enactment of the Bank Deposit Guaranty Act, under the able leadership of the distinguished Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, Mr. STEAGALL, of Alabama, no bank, National or State, operating under the terms of that measure have suspended. From January 1, 1934, up to March 5, 1934, deposits in national banks alone have increased $1,200,000,000.

Such is the picture and condition our financial institutions have achieved under the Emergency Banking Act, the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, and the Bank Deposit Guaranty Act. Not only have our domestic affairs improved but our foreign trade has likewise shown improvement since the enactment of the Gold Reserve Act, and the devaluation of the gold dollar.

These laws were designed to give the Government control over its money in the interests of all the people. We have seen the beneficent results of these policies and the increased value of commodity prices and the restoration of a measure of prosperity in our country and their stimulus to foreign trade.

This bill can be termed a companion measure to that relating to gold, having the same objective and working through the same machinery for the common good of our people as a whole, and should receive the unanimous approval of the Membership of this House.

The courageous and outstanding achievements of the President of the United States since his inauguration in dealing with all major problems so essential to the restoration of this country from the blight and devastated condition in which he found it give ample assurance to the people that this legislation rests upon a sound financial basis; that it will be enforced and administered in such manner as to neither shock nor disturb any legitimate business industry, but, on the other hand, will further stimulate and accentuate the essential forces of recovery, and I predict that as a result of this legislation agriculture, industry, labor, and every legitimate business, occupation, calling, or profession will be the beneficiaries of its wholesome effects. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the short title of this act shall be the "Silver Purchase Act of 1934."

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 3 the word "silver."

Mr. Chairman, I do that for the purpose of thanking the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee for his splendid explanation of this technical bill and to also make some further observations in regard to what appears in the hearings in connection with the hoarders of silver, beginning on page 169 and going through the hearings to the end of those disclosures.

The particular thing that attracts my attention in this connection is that in the list of hoarders of silver, storers of silver, and purchasers of silver appears the Bank of Manhattan Co., of New York, N.Y., H. Hentz & Co., of New York and London, and the Chase Bank of New York and its affiliates.

The Bank of Manhattan has for its president James P. Warburg, a close associate and adviser of the President and the Treasury during this period of the advancement in price of silver. They are the largest holders and purchasers of silver for speculation and, from a hurried examination that I have made, their customers were advised and did purchase a great amount of silver as a speculation, apparently on inside information.

The firm of H. Hentz & Co., of New York and London, is controlled by Bernard M. Baruch, who has been cited as the unofficial President of the United States, a close adviser of the administration, and one of the large political contributors to the President's last campaign.

The Chase National Bank seems likewise to be one of the names that is more frequently seen than any other on these different pages. They, too, are very closely allied and in the confidence of the President and the Treasury and this administration. They seem to be among the largest ones that have purchased and advised their clients to purchase, and are apparently the largest holders of silver at this time in this list.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that these are pertinent facts in connection with this silver matter. These houses have not only represented their own interests and the interest of their customers in America, but the list discloses that they were agents for large purchases for foreigners in the speculation which has taken place in silver. I submit this administration is vitally interested, as are its friends, in seeing that the price of silver is stabilized and it is interested in seeing that the price goes up.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I thank the gentleman for his fine sarcasm in respect to my explanation of the bill. If he will explain one or two things to me, I will thank him again. May I ask him why he wanted to impeach the last President and still nothing that this President does suits him? If he will answer that question, I will thank him again.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud of the opportunity that I will have this evening to cast my vote for the passage of this measure. We have heard some discussion from the Republican side of the House today claiming that this is such a new issue that with only 8 days' study they are not prepared to vote on the question. There is not an intelligent reader in the United States who has not been reading the discussion that has been carried on by the Congress and the press ever since silver money was demonetized in 1873. This is not a new issue. We are now coming back to a sane, sensible proposition of handling our money, and may I say to you that it is my contention now, and has been for a long time, that the real trouble with this Nation is the fact that we have been living on a single gold standard of money, where it has been concentrated in the hands of a few individuals, where they could manipulate the markets and bring on a depression whenever they wanted to, and which they did the last time for the purpose of further carrying on the making of money for themselves.

About 500 people in the United States have owned and own now around 90 percent of the money wealth of this Nation. They are the ones that brought on the depression. They are the ones that wrecked the Republican Party. I introduced a bill in this Congress 3 years ago to do practically the same thing which is sought to be accomplished by this bill, namely, to return to the double standard of money, both gold and silver, through the issuance of $2,000,000,000 worth of silver money. That was in your administration and under your President who was fighting for a high tariff and a gold standard. That is what he ran on and he received fewer electoral votes than any man that ever ran for the Presidency of the United States.

I think we need a double standard of money, both gold and silver. Our Constitution provides for this. We are not returning to a new policy today. We are just simply returning to the Constitution, which some of you claim to love so much, but when you get back to it you begin to squirm.

I was surprised at the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and his speech. Nobody could have told from his speech which side of the question he was on. I doubt whether he knows himself. This will silence the newspapers that have been working for a gold standard from talking about fiat money.

When you get gold and silver back of money as a base you have something then that will stop this cry; and not only this, you have a base for a currency in the United States whereby you can always expand our currency in accordance with the needs of the people.

You can no more carry on business and have it prosperous without money than a human being can live without blood coursing throughout the body. We must have more currency. You have only about $11,000,000,000 of gold in the world. You have not enough gold in the world upon which to predicate sufficient money even for the United States, let alone the entire world. It is silly to think about carrying on the business of the world on a gold standard with the limited amount of gold available. I am pleased we are off it, and I hope we will forever stay off it as a single standard.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentlemen of this House that when you return to this standard of money you are restoring help to agriculture in this country as you cannot in any other way. Agriculture has been crucified on a cross of gold at an altar of shame in this country, and you know it. Agricultural products went down and down and down to nothing on a single gold standard. If you had had a double standard of money, you never would have had a panic such as was never known before; a panic which wrecked the party over on the other side.

I was glad to see a revaluation of gold. This was a step in the right direction. Gold became entirely too high. It got so high that it took about $2 worth of labor to purchase $1 of it, and this is what wrecked labor in this country and is what wrecked the entire fabric of our Government. Money has to be regulated, and the revaluation of it resulted in the raising of commodity prices which had been swinging in an unequal balance of justice.

The only objection I have to this bill is that it does not go quite far enough. I should like to see the two moneys of our country tied together and have it on a 50–50 basis. I am a firm believer in the fact that the thing this country needs now most of all is an enlargement of the currency that goes into circulation. You have fewer dollars of money in actual circulation today than you have ever had before in this country, and this is what is the matter with the country. You cannot carry on business without money.

This bill authorizes an increase in currency and we will have more money under this measure.

If I were President of the United States today, with the authority given to him, I would issue enough of it to meet the needs of the people. We have now in the Treasury and Federal Reserve banks nearly $8,000,000,000 of gold, on which he could issue $15,000,000,000 of money and have a 40 percent gold reserve, the very thing you have been contending is all that is necessary under the gold standard. This is what we need and this is what we would have if we called in some of these interest-bearing bonds and paid them off and put the money into circulation. This country would then go on to prosperity.

During the last administration I heard the speeches over the radio of your President on many occasions and the boast of it all was that he had kept you on a high tariff and on the gold standard—the two things that absolutely wrecked his administration. If he had been off of that and on a progressive platform, he would have been much better off when the electoral votes were counted.

Oh, you talk over there about a brainstorm. There has been so much intelligence put into legislation in this House in the last 2 years that you think it is a brainstorm, when the truth of the matter is that not enough brains were used during the 4 years before and brains are being used now and you see the contrast and for this reason you think it is a brainstorm. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain correspondence and statements in connection with this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I have been giving consideration to the money question for a great many years, especially since I have been a Member of this House. Before I discuss the provisions of the bill, I want to call your attention to the methods we are using in the House of Representatives in passing legislation. I want to refer to the gold bill, the most important piece of legislation, in my judgment, that this Congress or any other Congress ever had to deal with. It will mean more to the future of our country than any other legislation which has been before Congress since I have been a Member.

When that bill was prepared and presented to the House a report was written by someone—I do not know whom, and I do not know who wrote the bill. The question was asked, "Who wrote the bill?", but this question has never been answered.

That committee's report was prepared by the Chairman of the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee or by someone else before the committee had ever seen the bill or before any hearings were held, and this report was voted out before 11 o'clock on the first day of hearings and before a single witness was consulted.

If that is the right way to pass legislation, I cannot agree to it.

I claim that proper consideration was not given to that very important bill, nor is proper consideration being given to the bill now before the House, notwithstanding the statement of the chairman of the committee. This bill will mean depression or prosperity. It is reported out by a committee that has no jurisdiction of the monetary question, and the only way jurisdiction was given the committee was because it put in a tax provision which was what gave it jurisdiction. This bill should have gone to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the members of which have made a study of this question and who have become informed especially about it.

I am opposed to methods of legislation that takes the right to legislate away from authorized representatives of the people, especially when we do not know and cannot find out who the authors of these bills are, and if we continue these methods we are going to destroy this form of government just as sure as you are sitting in the chairs you are occupying. [Applause.]

You know and I know that the prosperity of the people depends on the stability of gold and commodity values.

I am opposed to this bill because it does not take advantage of our great opportunity. It does not set up the principle of monetary control. It does not break the corner on gold. I want someone to explain how this breaks the corner on gold—I want an explanation from some advocate of the bill.

We are told that this makes silver a basic money. I cannot see it. It is a repetition of a form of silver money that has failed. It is another piece of legislation that ought to be defeated. [Applause.]

The bill does not restore the value of basic money in the world that was so destroyed by the action of Great Britain in 1929. It does not take from the international bankers the power to control our money and say whether we shall have prosperity or depression. I will tell you what it does do. It sets up a silver monetary bill without a monetary principle and without monetary control. Why do we leave out of this bill the principle of our control of money values? Why?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for 2 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, in this bill there is a provision which, we are told, is mandatory, which says that we shall have 75-percent gold and 25-percent silver. Let us see if this provision is mandatory. On page 2 it provides that no purchase shall be made hereunder "at a price in excess of the monetary value thereof"; and if next Monday, after the passage of this bill, the silver dollar reached the value of our gold dollar, we could not buy any additional silver at all, because it is forbidden under this part of the bill. I call the attention of this one of the jokers in this deck to those who are interested in silver from the silver-producing States. I do not care a continental about silver as such; but when I can use silver to bring back prosperity and control the purchasing power of gold, I am interested in that, because my constituents are crying out to me for relief from intolerable conditions which call for a remedy, and that is what I want to do. This bill will not do that.

Further, it provides that the Secretary of the Treasury can give you any price for your silver that he wants to. He can deduct any amount for seigniorage or other charges that he wants to, and under the bill he could pay you 10 cents an ounce if he wanted to.

MY DEAR SIR: I received a copy of your comments on money conditions and other subjects.

Money legislation, in my opinion, will be passed in the next Congress, and there is a question whether we are going to accept a sound piece of monetary legislation or whether we are going to permit Congress to pass unsound legislation.

The financial interests in this country should make up their minds that they are going to be compelled to accept some change in the present set-up, and instead of opposing every proposal, good or bad, it seems to me that they should endorse a proposal, if it is good, and oppose others that are not sound. I am enclosing to you, as an expert on finances and money matters, copy of a bill which seems to represent the thought of the conservative element of the House. I would like to have you point out to me the defects in this proposed legislation, if any. In hearings covering 3 or 4 weeks, we have yet to find a single man who has successfully pointed out any unsoundness in this legislation.

I would like very much to have your comments.

Verly truly yours,

A. P. LAMNECK.

THE CLEVELAND TRUST CO.,
Cleveland, February 16, 1933.

Hon. A. P. LAMNECK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with interest and care H.R. 13000, which you courteously sent me with your letter of February 13. The bill has many features fundamentally similar to some of those of the old silver proposals of the nineties and, accordingly, has in my opinion the corresponding defects. There is little to be gained by opening up that old controversy, for the bad features of bimetallism are recorded in many places and substantially demonstrated by much history.

The new feature of the plan (sec. 9b) seems to be that silver certificates will be redeemed with varying quantities of silver, in accordance with the gold value of silver. The new theory is apparently that the world price of silver in terms of gold can be raised and pegged by the United States Treasury, and that world commodity price levels will move up as the price of silver advances. I think the chief objection to the bill is that neither of these two assumptions appears to be tenable.

The recent and bitter failure of price-fixing schemes has been such as to afford little support for new attempts. Within our recent memories unsuccessful attempts have been made artificially to lift and maintain the prices of rubber, coffee, cotton, wheat, copper, sugar, and other basic commodities. All have failed.

It seems to me that this bill is fundamentally a similar project to lift and sustain the price of a commodity widely entering into world trade, and to do it by artificial means. The price of any commodity can be temporarily lifted by purchasing enough of it. At the present time silver is worth in the international market about 25 cents an ounce and gold about $20 an ounce, so that the ratio is not far from 80 to 1. By freely paying gold to acquire silver the price of the silver can be lifted above the level that the ordinary laws of supply and demand have established for it. This lifting can be accomplished and continued as long as those who hold gold are willing and able to pay it out to those who have silver, and bid prices sufficiently generous to cause the holders of silver to part with it. If this were continued indefinitely, the silver holders would have secured all the gold, and the previous gold holders would have secured a large amount of silver. After that, prices would work back to the levels that might then be established by supply and demand.

Despite all the additional provisions of the bill, the fundamental nature of the project is simple and of the sort just discussed. Every history of money records a variety of attempts of this nature, and we have experienced several of them in our national history. The outcomes have always been of the simple and straightforward sort that one would expect them to be, and have been along the lines described.

There is an additional question to be considered. The similar movements of silver prices and general commodity prices depend, it seems to me, upon the presence of free markets, including that for silver. That this similarity in movement would persist under conditions in which silver prices were artificially influenced could, I believe, be seriously questioned.

Sincerely yours,

LEONARD P. AYRES.

FEBRUARY 22, 1933.

Col. LEONARD P. AYRES,
Vice President the Cleveland Trust Co., Cleveland, Ohio.

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with interest your letter of February 16.

This matter refers to the most vital issue that could possibly confront our Nation, because it affects the solvency of our financial institutions.

Our obligations exceed our ability to pay by a very wide margin. The confidence element is crumbling, and many of the conservative Members of Congress are much concerned that a sound proposal shall be put before Congress to restore confidence.

I regret that your letter of February 16 has given a hasty rather than a studious consideration of the bill that I enclosed. This bill does not open up the old controversy of bimetallism; on the contrary, it maintains the single gold standard.

The bitter failures of price-fixing schemes have resulted quite naturally from a failure to recognize that man cannot alter economic law. I regret that you did not so scrutinize this bill as to see that, so far from being an effort to alter economic law, the plan proposed operates in conformity with economic law.

Instead of attempting to artificially fix the price, the bill sets up a new use and permits an increased demand for silver, and, operating under the law of supply and demand, gives a control which can be then used by the Government of the United States to control by natural processes a market that has been knocked down by artificial manipulation. You will note that a free market for both silver and gold is preserved under this bill.

It is greatly to be hoped that the Congress of the United States can have the earnest support and assistance of such men as yourself in this critical situation, and I therefore invite your attention back to this bill (H.R. 13000) so that you may see its aim is to accomplish exactly the opposite of what you have inferred in your previous reading, and as set forth in your letter of February 16. Please observe that this bill aims to maintain the gold standard as a standard, and remedies the defects of the gold standard, due to the expansion of the value of gold, as a result of the scramble for gold reserves by the leading nations.

If we can relieve gold from this extraordinary demand that under the law of supply and demand has expanded its value to a point that has destroyed the profits from productive industry in the United States, which is killing the goose that lays the golden egg for this country, and at the same time breaking down our credit structure, we are salvaging the gold standard, preserving the capitalistic system, reinstating gold as an honest measure of value, and putting our Nation in a position to go forward on a gold-standard basis.

Neglect this break-down in gold, which relates entirely to gold as a reserve, and not to gold as a standard, and you are without a remedy in this situation. What Congress wishes to do, and what the purpose of this bill is, is to maintain gold as a standard of measure to preserve its dependability, and protect its integrity, so that we will not have a complete break-down of the capitalistic system.

Are you opposed to the accomplishment of these objectives? If not, you will be interested in working with us to evolve some measure that will result in placing some commodity in competition with gold in our reserves and yet maintain gold as a standard of measure.

The break-down in gold has come since the war, as a result of an extraordinary demand for gold for the purpose of reserves. We must have values in our reserves to support our credit structure. These values should be measured by a fixed standard of measure, which with us must be the gold standard; but you entirely relieve the strain upon your reserves if you will put silver in reserve to the extent that meets this requirement.

You do not monetize silver by this process. You merely monetize your reserves, and you furthermore maintain the gold standard for measuring the value of your reserves. Can you see any objection to this method of salvaging the gold standard?

Very truly yours,

A. P. LAMNECK.

P.S.—Please read the article in the National Sphere for the month of March, by Mr. John Janney, chairman of the executive board of American Society of Practical Economists.

FEBRUARY 25, 1933.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Hyde Park, New York:

Ohio Democrats in House of Representatives at formal meeting, all present except one, have unanimously requested that you give an interview to committee of three for discussion of matter of major importance. Time is critically urgent. This relates to matter vital to success of your administration. We would not annoy you at this critical time in your affairs but we deem it absolutely necessary and as affecting the most vital policy of your administration as to matters that are now at focus and cannot be postponed, and touches a matter as to which, we believe, you have been inadequately advised. Patronage is not involved and will not be discussed. A direct interview is necessary. When may we have the privilege of meeting you?

ARTHUR P. LAMNECK, M.C.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., May 24, 1933.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed is a memorandum submitted in accordance with the request that you made at the interview yesterday, May 23, 1933, between Representative FIESINGER, of the Thirteenth Ohio District, Mr. John Janney, our economic adviser, and myself.

If it meets your pleasure, we should be very glad to have a further interview, as you suggested might be desirable, for the purpose of full explanation and clarification of this extremely important matter.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR P. LAMNECK, M.C.

MEMORANDUM—AMERICAN PLAN FOR THE CONTROL OF GOLD VALUES

The question is whether the United States acting alone can exercise a controlling influence on the purchasing power of gold in world markets.

We know that England acting alone had an effect upon gold values by demonetizing silver in 1819–21. We know that the individual action of Germany, France, and the Latin Union and America in demonetizing silver had a definite effect upon increasing the value of gold. The question is, Can one nation reverse this movement and lessen the value of gold by a process tending to break the monopoly of gold in its monetary use by expanding the use of silver in its competition with gold?

The answer to this question is: No; one nation acting alone cannot do this if you contemplate a use which requires a definite fixed value of silver in terms of gold. No nation acting alone can prevent those fine variations of value between gold and silver, which are sufficient in the case of coin money, to upset their parity and have the effect of driving out the greater-value coins and keeping the lesser-value coins.

This discussion, therefore, abandons any thought of coin silver or giving any value to silver by legislation. It presents an entirely new picture of silver as money in the United States, though it uses an old and well-accepted formula in the money systems of the world.

Let us see, first, if the United States acting alone can purchase and place in its monetary reserves 100,000,000 ounces of silver and devise such a monetary use for this deposit as will not result in driving out gold; which is to say, demonetizing gold.

Let us propose that this 100,000,000 ounces of silver is placed in the Treasury of the United States against a certificate exactly the equivalent of the gold certificate. That is to say, there is issued against this deposit a legal-tender certificate agreeing to pay to bearer on demand its face value in silver bullion. This value being expressed in American dollars is a gold-equivalent value.

No one can say that the United States has not the power to buy this much silver and place it to this use.

What we have done here is to start a process that represents a force in the money systems of the world, just as when the use of silver in the monetary world was diminished by the demonetization of silver in certain countries, only the force is, of course, not in the same, but in the opposite direction.

Now, then, can we deny that the United States has the power to purchase 200,000,000 ounces or 500,000,000 ounces of silver to be placed to this use? The question is, What will be the effect of the purchase of, say, 500,000,000 ounces of silver? It must be noted here that there are two things that have been accomplished. The purchase of this much silver is one thing, but putting it to a definite monetary use is a second and very much more important thing. To buy this much silver and adapt it to some use that might imply a future sale of the silver would be like the purchase of wheat by the Farm Board. A definite monetary use is a necessary part of any plan to expand the area of influence of silver in the monetary system.

If the United States of America does not undertake to purchase a given quantity of silver, and especially if the United States is careful not to attempt to place silver to a higher price than is easily within its power to maintain by this process of purchase, it is impossible to deny either that the Nation can do this thing alone or that the accomplishment of this will have an important bearing upon gold values in the markets of the world.

It may be urged that a flood of silver will be forced upon the United States by increased mine production or that the hoards of silver in Asia will be loosed upon the markets of the world. These two pictures must both be taken into consideration. If the United States is offering to buy this silver at a price that is high enough to bring out all this silver, it merely means that the price offered is too high.

The plan contemplated, therefore, must protect this phase of the question by reserving to the United States control in the matter of price which it offers for this silver. If the silver flood begins to pour, we must lower the price we offer. If the flood does not pour, we are privileged to continue to increase the price until we arrive at the desired level between gold and commodities.

As we continue to buy silver and place it in our reserves for the use stated, and as we thereby gradually raise the price of silver in the world, we are increasing the total value of the monetary wealth of the world to exactly that extent that we increase the value of silver in the world.

If under this plan the United States can add $3,000,000,000 to the value of silver in the world, which, let us say, is a value that has been destroyed by the recent action of England, it is reasonable that we will neutralize the effects of that action. But it is entirely within the power of the United States to continue to purchase silver should it develop to be necessary, until the value of the silver in the world can be increased $6,000,000,000, and to this extent reduce the value of gold. By continuing the process we can place gold at a value to reinstate the 1926 price level and hold it there.

Let us examine this question from the standpoint of a flood of silver. Let us assume that we will have a flood of silver. In this case, by keeping the price low the United States can add, by absorbing this flood of silver, to its monetary reserves a large volume of silver at a low value, and as we do this we will develop a desire on the part of other nations to gain for them the advantage of a monetary reserve by like process, provided these nations are situated as we are in reference to the price level. In other words, Brazil, Argentina, and other producing nations whose banks of issue are depleted of reserve, can see the advantage of buying low-priced silver, which inevitably must be facing a continual rising market as it is being purchased for this new use. In the event of a flood of silver the monetary system of the United States will be benefited by a large additional increment of silver in reserve to bolster up its debt structure and its monetary system.

If, on the other hand, the flood of silver does not come, by the purchase of a small amount of silver the United States adds value to the silver hoards distributed throughout the world, so that this monetary wealth will continue to spread in area until gold is restored to normal values.

We therefore must devise a plan which is equally adapted to the flood of silver which may come or to the contingency that a limited amount of silver only can be purchased within the price limits.

Having a plan that is adapted to these two extremes, we can now consider the probabilities of increased production of silver from the mines and the releasing of hoards of silver from Asia.

The charts will show that in all periods of stable silver values and increasing silver values, the balance of exports over imports of silver from Asia has been in favor of increasing imports. That is to say, Asia imports more silver under high prices and stable values, because silver gives a more desirable storage for wealth, and this demand for silver diminishes under low values of silver for the reverse reason. Charts have been compiled and are available to illustrate this. So, as to the hoards of silver in Asia, we cannot expect them to be available to us for the increase of our monetary reserves upon an increased price; but if for any reason they are rendered available and are let loose as a flood upon us, we will be benefited by this flood under this plan, as we are able to buy at lower prices and we can digest this silver by placing it to beneficial use as a care for the inflated debt structure, just as if that much additional value in gold had been produced from our mines or acquired in commerce.

Now, as to the increased production of the mines, we submit figures to show the production of silver in the world since 1873. During these years there have been various periods of rise and fall of the price of silver. It is significant that during periods of high prices of silver, such as existed during the World War, it became necessary for England to call upon the United States to give them the use of its silver reserves to meet the demand of silver from Asia.

Why did not these nations yield up their silver hoards at these high prices? Also, we note that during the period of 1920–21, when the United States was purchasing silver at $1 per ounce, the total world production was, roughly, 175 million ounces, whereas in 1927–29, when the price of silver was 65 cents an ounce, the annual production was around 250 million ounces.

The higher production of silver at lower prices is due, of course, to the fact that a ton of copper or a ton of lead would have to be produced from most of the silver mines of the world in order to produce a few pounds of silver. Since most of the silver is a byproduct from other metals, the law of supply and demand determining the production of these other metals will limit the production of silver by a rigid prohibition as to its excess production. Over 80 percent of the world's silver comes as a byproduct from such mines.

But there must be in any program a freedom to admit of possibilities. We must admit that the production of silver will increase and provide for taking care of that increase. The average production of silver over a period of 57 years has been 13.6 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold. Suppose the amount of silver produced in the world is doubled for the next 10 years over its present production. This is an extravagant assumption, but even that will be adding only 1,500,000,000 ounces of silver in 10 years, over the present rate of production, and would add only about 500,000,000 ounces in 10 years over the average rate of production in recent years.

But let us assume that over a period of 10 years twice this amount, or 1,000,000 ounces, of silver will be added to the normal production. What would be the effect of this additional increment to the 9,000,000,000 ounces already produced during the last 57 years? It would be one-ninth of the total production for these years, and would vary the ratio from 13.6 to 1 to approximately 15 to 1.

Under the plan proposed, not only could such an increased production of silver be absorbed, even if the United States were acting alone, but a much greater increase of production than this could be absorbed. No one familiar with the statistical position of silver or with the possibilities of increased production would claim that such an increased production would be probable or even possible.

Returning to the possibility of the United States acting alone: By purchasing 500,000,000 ounces of silver for this use we would offset the extraordinary amounts thrown on the market during recent years, sold through the Bank of India, through the melting out of European coins and from other sources. Having reinstated the supply and demand balance of silver by this purchase, if the United States were to purchase 50,000,000, or, at most, 100,000,000 ounces per year to add to its silver reserve, we could easily absorb any possible increased production. The only question would be: Do we so increase the monetary wealth as to create a disproportion between monetary wealth and circulating debts?

In view of the problem in the world of handling the continually increasing debt structure, this objection becomes a blessing and offers a means of escape rather than a burden for the United States, and opens a hope to the rest of the world for some relief from its burden of debts by providing for a more normal ratio between circulating wealth and circulating debts.

And it must not be lost sight of that all the time the United States Government is in control of the amount of silver placed in reserve, so long as it is in control of the price at which the silver is purchased; and the silver should not be purchased except to such an extent as restores the normal gold value—except that after restoring normal gold values the additional increment can be added to the monetary wealth of the world to enable a reduction of debts to the point that makes these debts a bearable burden to society. Only in this way do we effectually remove the risk of a break-down of society as a result of the continual pyramiding and mounting of its debts.

If the United States of America, acting alone, can buy 1 ounce of silver, it can buy 1,000,000,000 ounces of silver for such use as above stated. The question is, Where would 1,000,000,000 ounces of silver come from, and what would the purchase of this much silver do to gold values? It is much more easy to see that the purchase of 1,000,000,000 ounces of silver would be impossible without placing gold values below the scale of 100 on the commodity price level, than to visualize additional offerings of silver after this much had been acquired. But under the plan proposed, if additional offerings of silver do come, it is beneficial rather than a burden, because no fixed ratio is contemplated and no fixed value of silver is required, and a limit of value of the silver it will buy is within the control of the Government of the United States.

In other words, the picture is entirely different from any monetary picture that uses silver which has heretofore been presented by the American Government, and it employs the same formula, by restoring the area of silver monetary uses, which England has employed by reducing the area of silver in its monetary uses. It keeps under control the power factor so completely and so effectively that it is impossible to see anything that any other nation can do to upset or that would interfere with this control.

It is a very different thing from dealings in exchange where the nations with whom we deal have the power to dominate the supply and demand of these exchanges. It is a matter of dominating the demand for a commodity of very limited production. With the limited world stocks that are in existence and the even more limited world stocks that are available for purchase, this plan presents a completely new picture of America in its relation to world money. It cannot be visualized by the mind that has not first thrown out of consideration all of the rules and all of the usually accepted formulae that have to do with a money system with two metals coined with a given content, so that a parity must be maintained between the metals in order to assure a sound monetary system.

The above is a memorandum requested by the President in interview May 23, 1933.

MAY 26, 1934.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
the White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have just read the remarks of Senator KEY PITTMAN in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 22, 1934, on page 9216, in which he says:

"I am authorized, on behalf of the President, to whom I talked over the telephone, to make these changes, and also to state that, at the time the question was raised by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], that the bill did not make silver primary money; the President expressed his ignorance of what the words 'primary money' meant."

I agree with Senator THOMAS that your bill does not make silver a primary money. How can you, in view of your reported statement, take the responsibility of substituting for the bill, which has been proposed by the authorized committee of the House of Representatives, a different bill proposed by your advisers who have no responsibility under the Constitution for enacting legislation of this kind—especially when silver must be made basic money to defend America in its present critical situation.

The Members of the House, as you will recall, have been since February 1933 trying to inform you and other members of your Cabinet, including the Secretary of the Treasury, on the kind of monetary legislation which would make silver primary money under American control and without international complications.

I repeat now what the Ohio delegation, in a telegram to you on February 23, 1933, said, before you took the oath of office. In that telegram they asked the privilege of an interview with you to discuss legislation we were proposing of vital importance to the success of your administration. Had that legislation been investigated impartially and passed by the Congress of the United States we would now be out of the depression.

The silver program proposed in Senate 3658 is a piece of legislation without definite policy as to prosperity or depression in our price levels. It will not produce the results America wants and will be certain to continue the depression for some time to come, and, in my humble opinion, will absolutely wreck the Democratic Party.

Through the proper monetary legislation lies your only way out. The only proposals that could be at all considered as an American program, favorable to the American people, that has been introduced in the Congress are the Wheeler amendment to the gold bill in the Senate and the Fiesinger bill in the House of Representatives, and neither of these measures were advanced or approved by your advisers, though they both make silver legal tender for its accepted value, which is what makes it basic money. Their suggested legislation has been against American interests.

Silver must be used as a defensive weapon to control the value of the commodity—gold, which measures in world markets property and commodity values. Silver must be used to break and control the corner on gold. Therefore it must be made a primary money, and it must be under control of America, freed from international restraint. All of this could be made clear if the Rules Committee would permit the debate in the House on this important subject.

Certificates issued against the silver bullion in the Treasury and made legal tender would make silver the metal of ultimate redemption, and if measured out in gold equivalent values would keep these certificates at all time on a parity with other gold moneys.

Silver should be taken into the Treasury at the world market price. The limit on quantity and price could be set when we reach the 1926 price level. However, according to the proposed bill, you fix limitations which will prevent both the control and the reservation of prosperity and price levels that will bring prosperity. You fix limitations which tie your hands so that you will have a price level that will never restore prosperity to this country and will continue to permit the international bankers and foreign countries to regulate our money values and to say whether America should have prosperity or depression.

The House measure, embodied in the Fiesinger bill, is the legislation we should have. No expert in the service of the Government or outside of the Government has produced any arguments that I have seen or heard to prove that it would not restore the price level and break the corner on gold, which are the two objectives that we must attain.

I am a member of your party, would make any sacrifice within my power to restore normal conditions, but when we face adjournment with such a money proposal as introduced by Senator PITTMAN I can see nothing but darkness and disaster to our party and country.

I am writing this letter in all sincerity for your interest and simply to try to influence you some way to make a very detailed examination of the legislation that you are advocating in comparison with the legislation which we wish to have fair discussion in Congress and which you and your advisers seem to be opposing.

Assuring you of my loyal support and best wishes, I am,

Respectfully yours,

A. P. LAMNECK, M.C.

WILLARD HOTEL,
Washington, D.C., December 23, 1933.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
White House, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The interview between Dr. Sprague and the writer, which occurred on October 5, and which was referred to by the Speaker of the House in his speech in New York and as noted in the newspapers of day before yesterday, emphasizes the importance of my immediately writing to you as to what I believe to be a conspiracy against the United States. I will refer also to recent interview with Dr. Warren and Professor Rogers, which followed from my visit to the White House, in response to letter I received from your secretary, Mr. McIntyre, requesting that I interview these gentlemen. I feel it my duty to report to you that in all of these interviews I found a startling absence of fundamental thinking, so far as the interest of the United States is concerned. I found a subtle completeness of thought processes, so far as protecting the interest of Europe is concerned. I further found an absence of comprehension as to the difference in the interests of Europe and the United States.

I attribute this advocacy of Europe and betrayal of American interest to orthodoxy or teaching and not to a deliberate effort to betray our country.

I do not know why your secretary wrote me to interview these men, nor why Secretary Woodin arranged the interview with Dr.

Sprague, which interview was taken down by a competent reporter and is available in detail for your consideration. I did not request these interviews. On the contrary, in my letter of November 1 to Mr. McIntyre, I gave reasons against the interview proposed by him. I do not understand just what my responsibility is in this important matter. But if these proceedings have any taint of placing responsibility upon me as an economic advisor of certain Members of the House of Representatives or of the committee of the House, who has reported on this question, I feel sure you will pardon me if I wish to fully divest myself of any such responsibility.

A frank statement of my personal views and impressions gained in these conferences would seem to be in order. My view is that you are surrounded by advisers who have honestly absorbed English tutorage on monetary policy.

This is a point of danger, but the greatest danger is something entirely different. I sense a kind of conspiracy among European sources of influence or propaganda to the end that this Nation is being led into a trap. We are all of us being surrounded by this influence.

You, yourself, broke away from it as formulated in one trap, by eleventh-hour action as to the London Conference. How nearly we fell into that trap, you are fully advised. Now, in a little different form, the same trap is set again and you must be equally diligent. I feel it in line with my duty in the above situation to make to you a formal report and record as follows:

These interviews, so far as they were permitted to progress, show that these three men, Dr. Sprague, Dr. Warren, and Professor Rogers, are all in favor of an economic theory that should be considered favorable to England, France, and other nations in their class, and against the interest of the United States and nations economically situated in its class.

Dr. Sprague was frank in expressing favor of English control of money values and opposed to American control. Professor Warren and Professor Rogers, while not so frank in expressing this view, are in favor of policies that will result by subtleties in English control of world moneys. There is a trap set here where the real truth is not disclosed because it is not superficial and these men seemed to be unwilling to dig into the subsurface and consider the fundamental facts. They are not frank as Dr. Sprague was in avowing favor for English control. They would, in fact, deny it in words, while they advocate it in action—not intentionally, of course.

I do not need, Mr. President, to tell you that I have complete confidence in you in every respect; your loyal advocacy of the interests of the United States; your intelligent grasp of this question; your earnest effort to serve the people. These need no eulogy from me, but as President Washington was misled in his advocacy of the Jay Treaty, which relinquished our right to the freedom of the seas, as President Grant was misled in his approval of the monetary law of 1873, so it is possible for you to be misled, unless you consider the two sides of this monetary question and share with Congress this responsibility by permitting full and free debate upon this question.

I will state briefly and somewhat roughly these two opposing principles:

AMERICAN INTEREST

If you will study a proposal to increase the gold content of the dollar 25 percent, or to about 28 grains of gold, and then lower the purchasing power (as expressed in world commodities) of gold to the 1926 price level for this new dollar you are thereby increasing the purchasing power of the products of American resources in terms of world trade to an extent that will insure American prosperity. This would be decreasing the purchasing power of the ounce of gold to approximately 50 percent of its present purchasing power. It would give the 1926 price level to the dollar and a still higher price level to our commodities in terms of world trade.

EUROPEAN INTEREST

If you decrease the gold content of the dollar 50 percent you lower the purchasing power of the dollar but leave the purchasing power of commodity gold uncorrected. Then you advance European interest and defeat permanently American interest. (By purchasing power I mean in terms of world trade and not in terms of dollars or other currencies.) It can be undeniably shown that this plan does not give to America control of the value of her commodities in world trade. It does not give to America control of the purchasing power of gold, but you do sacrifice permanently the great opportunity now available to you. If you do not change the gold content of the dollar you can control the value of gold and also the value of the dollar. If you increase the gold content you strengthen the American position. But if you decrease the gold content you will thereby decrease the purchasing power of American resources to a degree that will insure great prosperity for the nonproducing nations of Europe and saddle this country with a lengthy period of depression. And that is not all, you will permanently place this country in a position where it cannot exercise the power now available to control gold values as a commodity, which means the purchasing power of our products in world markets.

THE TWO PLANS CONTRASTED

The difference in the two plans is essentially this: In the first, America assumes control of the purchasing power of all gold values in world commerce among gold-standard countries. In the second, we leave this control with Europe and thereby we leave to them the power to manipulate our changed gold dollar hereafter and to manipulate the currencies of the world. Our power to correct our position which we have suffered ever since 1836 is gone. Our position will then become intolerable.

Whoever controls gold values in terms of dollars or francs or other detached currencies, accomplishes nothing other than an adjustment between debtor and creditor. Whoever controls the value of the commodity gold, controls the prosperity of this Nation and the commerce of the world.

The value of world commodities in undefined currencies represents a vital deception that has worked into this discussion. This deception must be cleared before we make a false step based upon it. The stakes are momentous, are ruinous. They represent a disadvantage to this country that will run into billions of dollars per year. This loss we cannot continually endure.

If this disadvantage is fastened upon this country by binding international agreement, such as the Jay Treaty or the Hay-Ponceforte Treaty, it will eventually mean war between the United States and Europe or else the complete servitude of the United States to Europe in monetary policy. America will then be somewhat in the position India now occupies.

Without the freest kind of public discussion and free parliamentary debate, such an arrangement would take the risk of a revolution in this country and the responsibility of determining an issue of such far-reaching consequence is a responsibility that cannot be taken in any other way unless the spirit and intent of our Constitution are ignored.

This whole proceeding in regard to our monetary policy must be taken away from secret discussions of experts and given a full and free airing upon both floors of Congress if there is to be any chance of counteracting European education and European influences which all who understand this subject see clearly to be a potent force in guiding such clouded public opinion as prevails on this subject in America.

Permit me to say that the gold-content clause was not allowed freedom of debate in the House of Representatives at the time it was enacted. It was urged as an expedient to give power to the Government for the purposes of the London Conference. It was in some quarters considered as a delegation of power not to be used unless necessary, without further debate in Congress. The record will show that there was no adequate debate on this question.

Permit me further to say that the entangling agreements with other countries as embodied in the proceedings at the world conferences, secured by Senator PITTMAN, relating to limitations of the action of governments, as to silver, will have the effect of limiting our control in this matter. Otherwise, it can be shown that we have free control. If we engage in entangling alliances with other nations as to the matters of monetary policy proposed in this morning's papers, you will further tie the hands of this Nation without any compensating advantage.

And in conclusion permit me to say that you cannot safely blindly follow these men who are your advisers. At least, you cannot follow them so long as they cannot face a discussion across the table in the presence of responsible Government officials, in the presence of a reporter to make a record of this discussion, and in the presence of Representatives of the Congress who are members of this committee charged with constitutional responsibility in this matter.

Our country is being betrayed by false teaching. This is not my personal view alone. It is the view of almost all of those who with me have studied this question. What I have stated in this letter represent the views of many of our patriotic citizens who find themselves unable to speak to you on this subject. Among them are citizens of this country who perhaps hold a higher constitutional authority and responsibility than even the executives hold on this subject. I refer to a member of the committee of Congress, which under the Constitution has jurisdiction on this subject, which committee, under authority of expressed resolution of Congress (Feb. 8, 1932) has devoted months of study to this subject, and has stated to Congress, in formal report, that we are suffering from "the legislative acts of European countries" (Rept. No. 1320, May 14, 1932). I refer also to a member who in conference with other members of this committee has introduced a bill in Congress (H.R. 1577 of the first session of this Seventy-third Congress) which gives a defensive plan to America and in a way that avoids entangling agreements with other countries.

In my interview with your various advisors I have been shocked to find that these men not only have not studied this proceeding of Congress but apparently they did not know of it. In my conference with Dr. Sprague, I found that the paper which you requested should be submitted on this subject to you on May 24 had never been read by him. On that date you requested Congressman FIESINGER, Congressman LAMNECK, and myself to submit a certain written discussion bearing on this question. This was handed by Congressman LAMNECK to your secretary, Mr. McIntyre. It was submitted by him to Dr. Sprague, and in the conference with Dr. Sprague, in answer to question, it was disclosed that he had never considered the matters contained in this document.

It is with great regret that I feel it necessary to occupy your valuable time with this communication. You will recall I have never before since your election to the Presidency volunteered any communication to you on this subject. There have been many requests that I know of from others or suggestions that I communicate with you on this subject. Until now I have not seen it as my duty to do so.

I now see the possible betrayal of the vital interests of this country, innocently of course, but none the less effectively, unless these vital matters are given full consideration. Those who pose as advocates of these two respective sides of this question must be heard. You cannot leave the advocacy of the American side of this question to your advisors for the reasons I have above suggested, and the intimation in today's press of a hasty action on the very eve of the assembly of Congress, in a matter where constitutional authority is vested in Congress, causes me the greatest concern and I may venture to say, strongest sense of personal responsibility.

Someone should communicate with you thus freely and frankly on this important matter. Everyone is leaving it for someone else to do. In this circumstance, I feel I must view my responsibility as advisor to Members of Congress in this matter, a sufficient ground to trespass upon your valuable time to the extent of sounding this note of warning as to the hidden dangers that lurk below the surface in this intricate and important matter.

With great respect, I am

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN JANNEY.

Mr. JOHN JANNEY,
Chairman of the Executive Board,
American Society of Practical Economists,
Willard Hotel, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. JANNEY: I notice that your letter to the President, dated December 23, 1933, has been reprinted in the hearings of the House Coinage Committee on the Gold Reserve Act of 1934. In this letter you state, on the basis of our interview of last November, that I am in favor "of English control of money values and opposed to American control."

Although I have not the benefit of the stenographic notes which were taken at the time, a copy of which I think it would have been courteous to send me, my recollection of the conversation is very clear. You asked me whether I believed it possible for any single nation to control money values, and I replied very definitely that, in my opinion, it was not possible. I then added that in view of recent disclosures regarding certain bankers in New York City, if it were possible, in my judgment, there was more professional spirit, as well as wider world experience, among British bankers than was possessed by American bankers. In saying this I was not contradicting my earlier statement that it was impossible for any nation to control the value of money.

In view of the wide publicity which is being given to your letter at the present time, I must insist that you make this correction in your statement of my views.

Yours truly,

O. M. W. SPRAGUE.

WASHINGTON, D.C., March 5, 1934.

Dr. O. M. W. SPRAGUE,
Harvard University, Boston, Mass.

DEAR DR. SPRAGUE: Your letter of February 28 was duly received. I am glad to receive this letter because it seems to offer the hope that you might favor a plan for American control of money values. The most important single problem before the world today is to restore normal and stable buying power to gold at a price level that will restore prosperity and under American control.

As soon as you can advise me that you definitely favor such an accomplishment I can show you how it can be done and I believe I can provide a way for you to help.

You refer to my open letter of December 23 to President Roosevelt, in which I said: "Dr. Sprague was frank in expressing favor of English control of money values and opposed to American control."

In the interview at the Treasury Department in October you were asked as to this choice of control and in your reply you said: "I think it had better be in London at the moment." This is an expression in favor of English control.

Also you said: "I do not think we have developed in our disorganized or multiplicity of banks a personnel to exercise that control wisely if it were possible, as wisely as England, * * *." I think you will agree with me that these expressions afford a basis for my statements to the President.

You were not asked the question whether you "believed it possible for any single nation to control money values." I will quote in full Mr. Blagden's question and your reply.

"Mr. BLAGDEN. That, of course, I think we all know, but we have not gotten any nearer answering the very first question, and the very first question is, Do you think it would be better if the United States took possession of the control of gold values, or if we left this control with England?

"Dr. SPRAGUE. Given our existing banking organization and banking personnel and limited experience in world affairs, if anybody had to control, as I say, I do not think it can happen, I think it had better be at London at the moment. I do not think we have developed in our disorganized or multiplicity of banks a personnel to exercise that control wisely if it were possible, as wisely as England, and I would not want to see it in London, but as a practical matter, where I would prefer it lodged at the moment, it would be in London for those reasons which are not fully developed. I am simply accepting it as a business proposition that there is more experience, more sense of responsibility, if you please, on the whole, though not enough."

You ask as to a copy of the record of this conference. Shortly after this conference Secretary Woodin telephoned me that he had arranged an interview between President Roosevelt, himself, and myself. The absence of Secretary Woodin has indefinitely postponed this interview. Mr. Blagden has an extra copy of this conference available, and this would probably have been forwarded to you before this but for the illness of Mr. Woodin, who would, of course, be the proper person in the circumstances to furnish you a copy, as this interview was arranged by him while he was Secretary of the Treasury and while you were in the employ of the Treasury Department.

I am very well aware that this Nation acting alone can control the buying power of gold and I am informed as to how this can be done, but for some reason which I cannot explain there is a resistance to the free circulation of basic truth about it. There is a kind of suppression of simplicity as though it were a doctrinal subject which needs to be injected with mystifications and complexities and which is distracted by divisions of opinion, whereas there is no difference of opinion when you get down to the fundamentals; neither is there room for mystification. It is all simple mathematics with the one and only formula, the demand-supply ratio, which is the simplest of mathematical equations.

Civilization is going into a tail-spin unless a complete reversal toward a sound monetary control of gold values in terms of buying power of gold is soon adopted. A major disaster is bound to follow from either continued monetary artifices or a prolonged stagnation of world commerce. What we have from China, Austria, France, Germany, and elsewhere are but the rumblings of an impending cataclysm.

Very truly yours,

JOHN JANNEY.

Hon. MARVIN H. MCINTYRE,
Secretary to the President,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Following a conversation that was had with your secretary, Mr. Kenney, this morning, I am again renewing the request made to President Roosevelt on or about February 26 last, and again a few days ago to you personally.

The enclosed copy of telegram contains the information the delegates from Ohio wish you to have as to facts, and we are somewhat perplexed to know why this interview has not been granted, since it involves, in our opinion, matters of very great importance.

We desire to talk with President Roosevelt relative to certain matters outlined in conference with a considerable number of the Members of the House of Representatives, and which, we believe, will reflect the majority views of the House if brought before it for a vote at this time.

No legislation that has been or is now being considered by the President is, in our view, as important for the success of his administration and for the success of the Democratic Party as this proposal.

We shall greatly appreciate an opportunity to lay this matter before President Roosevelt at the earliest possible time.

Sincerely yours,

A. P. LAMNECK, M.C.

NEW YORK CITY, November 1, 1933.

Hon. M. H. MCINTYRE,
Secretary to the President,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. MCINTYRE: Your letter under date of October 26 arrived yesterday.

It will give me pleasure, at any time, to do anything I can that will be helpful to the administration in its study of economic conditions, and I will gladly meet with the gentlemen you have named for a free and unrestricted exchange of views such as may be helpful in digging out the truths that govern these matters.

However, in your proposal to discuss Judge FIESINGER's views with Professor Warren, I wonder if the President realizes that the conflict between Professor Warren's proposals and Judge FIESINGER's are so fundamental that neither should be an arbiter of the other's proposals. To all, so far as I know, who understand the fundamental idea of the Fiesinger bill, Professor Warren's proposals are pro-British in their economic effect, and I think it can be shown that they are a contributing factor in the rapidly reviving British prosperity as well as an important factor in the continuance of American depression.

If I might be permitted to make a suggestion it would be that Professor Warren's views should be studied by the administration, in contrast with the recommendations I have made to Congress (as set out in the committee's reports and in the Fiesinger bill) and in such circumstances that each has full opportunity to point out, to the administration, all the defects of the one as well as the benefits of the other. And to show the costs to follow from the mistakes that each may see in the plans of the other. Nothing but benefit could come to the Government from such a discussion for it would tend to clarify this fundamentally simply subject which has been unintentionally confused.

I hope, Mr. McIntyre, you will not misunderstand my venturing to offer any suggestion at this time. I do it not because I consider my views important, but I feel very strongly that the success of this administration and perhaps even the success of our form of government turns upon whether it can quickly get a clear conception, and an operating conception, of the simple fundamental truths that govern this overwhelmingly important subject.

I believe I can speak for Judge FIESINGER, I certainly do for myself when I say that if the findings of facts and the principles set out in the reports of the committee of Congress are not studied by the administration and applied to the entanglements this country is drifting into, this economic depression will continue for generations; just as occurred after 1872. In that year a committee of Congress, after conferring with Ernest Seyd, of London, drafted a bill—which according to the record of Congress was based on his advice—which bill afterward became the basis of a monetary policy which was followed by 20 years of depression in this country and by the prosperity of the Victorian era in England.

I believe Judge FIESINGER's committee is the only committee of Congress that has studied this monetary problem from this point of view. His bill, I understand, has the endorsement of a majority of his committee and was drawn as a result of a conference with various members of his committee. I believe it is the only committee of Congress that has ever reached a definite diagnosis of causes and presented a plan defensive to American interests—a strictly American plan that does not require the approval of international conferences nor the cooperation of nations which are interested in lower price levels, while we are already definitely committed to price level higher than they are willing to concede.

You say in your letter, "If you will advise me when you will next be in Washington, I will be glad to arrange conference, etc.", which would indicate there is no particular need to hurry this matter. I am ready to make a special trip to Washington at any time, upon receipt of a telegram from you, because I strongly feel that time is running against us and therefore that early action is a matter of vital importance.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN JANNEY.

WILLARD HOTEL,
Washington, D.C., January 1, 1934.

Hon. M. H. MCINTYRE,
Secretary to the President,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. MCINTYRE: In our telephone conversation of Saturday you asked me to let you have a written statement on the point under discussion and, as I understood, you referred to the subject of money control in the sense of the control of the purchasing power of the metallic base.

The function of governments as to currencies, bank notes, and credits is oftentimes delegated to banks. In some governments the value of the monetary base is controlled at the discretion and in the power of banks. The Bank of England, which is a private bank, enjoys large powers in both of these respects.

In the United States the case is different. The power to regulate credits may be delegated to bank managements but not the power to regulate the value of the metals from which coins are made. Under our Constitution this power rests with Congress. "Congress shall coin money and regulate the value thereof."

By the value of a metal we mean its buying power. The depression of property values in the world is synonymous with enhancement in gold values in countries where gold is the standard of measure.

This tragic world event which we call "depression" always occurs when there is a depressed value of the total metallic or money base of the world. Prosperity has always accompanied an increase in the value of the world money base at the rate of 3.2 percent or more per year. In history there has been no exception to this natural and fundamental fact situation when averaged over a period of years sufficiently long to register. In a few words, this fact may be crudely stated as "The more there is of a thing the less it will buy."

The nation which controls the gold value of the world money base will control the price level in all gold-standard countries and will at least share equitably in world trade and commerce and export profitably its surpluses of production.

The depression of the money base paralleled the destruction of Rome and the Dark Ages. The depression of the money base accompanied the depression of 1873–96. The depression now in progress has accompanied a serious depression in the gold value of the money base.

By the value of the money base I mean the gold value of the metal used in the world as a monetary reserve for governments, banks, corporations, and individuals, as a basis for business activities. This includes the monetary gold and monetary silver of the world. Together they constitute the base of the credit structure and capital structure of the nations and the vital force back of world commercial activities. These two metals under normal conditions are freely exchangeable each for the other at their market value and the depression of one, for this reason, reacts upon the other. They both therefore must be reckoned as a part of the world monetary base.

This interaction between gold and silver was testified to by Mr. Montague Norman, of the Bank of England, in 1926. I can furnish you with charts to show this relationship with almost uncanny accuracy. And this relation can be controlled by the United States in the interest of stability with greater ease than other nations have affected it by their activities and the power to control this is placed in the hands of the Government of the United States by the Fiesinger bill now before Congress.

The United States is just now vitally concerned in this matter and for the moment is in the hands of a government which has announced a policy of restoring the 1926 price level which is a prosperity price level. At the same time the administration has declared for a dollar whose value will not materially change in a generation, and for a sound dollar which means a dollar recognized in world markets as carrying its face value and which is accepted as such value by world markets.

The achievement of this policy would restore prosperity to the United States, would open a market for its products on a profitable basis, and should be the aim of all departments of the Government. However, all of the advisers of the administration with whom I have discussed this matter would sacrifice some of these qualities in order to secure others and thus defeat the high aspirations of the President in affording this country the economic protection it must have and has a right to expect.

To restore gold values in the metallic base to where they were in the year 1926 would cost this Nation, operating under the Fiesinger bill less than $5,000,000 net. It could be accomplished within 90 days. Those who do not wish to admit the law which operates here to produce these results can offer no real opposition as there could be no material loss of either time or money. On the other hand a favorable demonstration would save billions of dollars of values material, and other losses, moral and physical, beyond our power to compute or even imagine.

This is perhaps the first time in our history that our Government has been in the hands of the real interest of the people, facing a break-down of a former system with the opportunity before it of an open doorway to the control of money values. The authority for this control has been placed by our Constitution in the hands of Congress. The door of opportunity stands wide open and this Government has not yet moved in that direction. Our experts are not urging that we take control of the world money base away from corporations and banks and foreign governments to place this control of this powerful factor for human welfare or human woe in the hands of Congress.

If the group in the committee of Congress which has recommended this control is to be heard in the councils of the administration, they would recommend in some form the principles for American control of the world money base as set out in the Fiesinger bill (H.R. 1577).

This bill gives a clean-cut, definite, simple program for taking control of the money base and exercising that control so as to completely carry out the policies of the President as publicly announced and as above outlined.

The Fiesinger bill involves no complications; it involves no experiment. It uses accepted or proven methods and accomplishes a complete and uncompromising control of the gold value of the money base until the 1926 price level in terms of gold is captured and permanently held. It takes the control of price levels away from individuals and establishes a price level fair to all and in the power of Congress alone to change.

This leaves the matter of bank credits, currencies, and exchange to receive consideration as soon as the bases upon which they rest, and the values with which they have to deal, are rendered stable and definite. The power of private manipulators and exploiters is curbed to such an extent as will guarantee protection to the people. And the basis for the people of one nation to exploit the people of another nation becomes modified to such an extent as to pave the way for disarmament by removing the real reason for maintaining armaments.

Today we have a whole nation back of a government which has defined a policy that implies that this thing will be done. The thing that gives me concern as expressed in my letter to the President of December 23 is the apparent unwillingness of the administration's present advisers to face this issue. None of them have been willing to discuss the matter.

On the contrary, we have all the various red herrings that it would seem possible to devise to lead us away from an American plan to control the money base and leave this control in the hands of those who have been exercising it to our destruction during the past century and a half.

These diversions leading us away from American control receive almost daily comment from high political advisers, from the press, and other sources of discussion. On the other hand, it seems impossible to gain adequate consideration for any plan that will give American control.

They are:

1. The 16 to 1 remonetization of silver, which would so limit the scope of the action of our Government as to curb and hamper its power of monetary control. In addition there would be the handicap of two standards of value to be maintained of equal purchasing power. This would lessen our control and increase foreign power of control of the money base.

2. The silver proposals of Senator PITTMAN which would leave Europe in the control of the money base and of world money values and require that our silver money be supported by gold in order to maintain its parity.

3. The change of the gold content in the dollar which operates on our national currency and not on the world money base. It changes the value of dollars, as a currency unit, not the value of gold. It changes the value of debts but does not increase the ability to pay, because it does not correct the lowered buying power of our products in the markets of the world which is the basis of profits.

4. International agreements as to silver which destroy our freedom of control and limit the freedom of world silver markets upon which the operation of an American plan for control of world money must be based.

These various proposals all leave Europe in control of the value of our property and our commodities in world markets. They all constitute a surrender of the constitutional power of Congress to control money values. They do not permit Congress to any longer regulate the value of the metals which we coin.

In point of fact this Fiesinger bill is the only method yet proposed under which Congress is permitted to discharge this duty of our Government delegated to it under our Constitution.

Do you know of any valid objections to the Fiesinger bill? None of the advisers of the Government whom I have had the privilege of conferring with have urged any objection to it at all. After months of investigation and after serious conferences with leaders in banking and finance I can find absolutely none with the exception that the power to regulate values is taken away from banks and placed automatically at the price level fixed by Congress. This would be an objection to the President's policy and not to the bill, for in this respect the bill adopts the policy of the President.

The most far-reaching benefit from this bill is that the American dollar reinstates a world-recognized value as a basis for world trade. This dollar is in a position of advantage in competition with bank credits and fiat exchange of foreign countries. Sterling exchange becomes a secondary world money and not a primary world money.

No other form of dollar currency can meet this requirement. The plans proposed for the consideration of our Government will sooner or latter be attached to sterling by some form of agreement and those who manipulate sterling will also manipulate dollars.

The constitutional control of Congress will pass by this arrangement to foreign countries. Our people and possibly our courts will seek to repudiate such a violation of our Constitution as soon as the burden of it presses down as hard as it inevitably will upon us and becomes discernible to the senses of a confused people. The armies and the navies of the other parties of these agreements will be there to guard the other interest who have entered into the agreement against us.

You have uncertainty, confusion, and danger on the one hand and clear-cut right, justice, and simplicity on the other. Why cannot this matter receive consideration from our Government at least equal to that being given to these various proposals, all of which in common leave to European bankers and European governments the control of the value of and the markets for our property and our products.

Here is an American plan for American control of the purchasing power of gold through the means of the control of the world monetary base. We take possession of the same means that other nations have used but which we have neglected to use. We control by this process the gold value of the metallic base of gold plus silver in the world which the history of two centuries demonstrates, without any doubt, to be the basis for the control of the prosperity of the producing nations of the world.

It will cost us nothing to do this. It involves simply the purchase of silver and its use in our national money reserves, for its world-accepted value and to such extent as will raise the value of the silver half of the world's monetary base and lower the value of the gold half of the world's monetary base until gold reaches its normal purchasing power as of the year 1926.

Nothing could be more simple. Nothing could be easier. Why cannot the approaching session of Congress address itself to this simple solution of the world's monetary ills. If Congress will do this our monetary troubles will soon be a thing of the past.

The basis of Government and banking finances will then be firmly established. Credits can be extended with confidence. Commerce will begin to move among the nations because central banks can provide themselves with adequate reserves to support currency and commercial requirements. Surpluses will vanish by moving into the voids of want and privation in remote sections of the world. Prices will rise under this natural demand and a profit basis will be restored.

Individuals and corporations will find operating capital to back up the activities thus created. The buying power of home markets will revive through the disbursement of these profits. And the buying power of Asia with the increasing standard of living and a stable system of finance assured from its stable world buying power, will develop in each one of its thousand million people, an ever increasing buying power for our products so that we may transform an overequipped world into a world of ever-increasing wants to be satisfied only by ever-increasing circulation of world products. Such a state of affairs, as far as Asia is concerned, has never existed in the history of modern finance as will be established by this bill.

There is much available data which I have collected to back up these statements and it will give me pleasure to do what I can to meet any objections which you may find being raised to this proposal. And if none can be raised, can I not rely upon you as a patriotic American citizen to help clear away misunderstandings and confusion as to this important matter.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

JOHN JANNEY.

THE WILLARD HOTEL,
Washington, D.C., June 3, 1933.

MY DEAR SENATOR PITTMAN: I am very much concerned to feel that you might be opposed to the United States of America reserving an independent position as to its use of silver, or that you might favor, at an international conference, the giving up of powers which America should hold for her self-preservation in the vital matter of price levels.

Such an impression was given out in a conversation with Governor Cox on May 24, initiated at the suggestion of President Roosevelt in a conference with him on the previous day, and both Representative FIESINGER, of Ohio, and his colleague, Representative LAMNECK, who were present at both conferences, share the feeling I have.

Will you pardon me, in this serious situation of our national affairs, if I so presume as to say to you that, in my view, for America to yield up in an international conference the freedom of opportunity she now enjoys, at any time she sees fit to use it, to use silver to control gold value, would be a tragedy greater than any of those that might result from ill-considered action at the international conference.

To permit Europe to restore their silver holdings by the 5-percent reserve provision would be placing European nations back into a position to again dump silver at some future time and to again bring about higher gold and lower commodity values just as was done in 1928–29–30.

And to limit silver prices to anything like 60 cents per ounce, which would only restore something like $2,000,000,000 of additional value to world monetary stocks, would surely prohibit a revival of price levels necessary to American prosperity. What is more important, such an arrangement might be so drafted as to shackle America in future operations in the control of money value and limit our activities that might be directed toward control of these values.

I should like to feel that you have given very serious consideration to the matter of whether or not any agreement arrived at at the world conference which would limit the freedom of action of the United States, either to acquire silver in any amount desired or to raise the market value of silver in the world, as might be needed, to control gold in terms of commodities, could be viewed by those who understand the Fiesinger bill (House bill 1577) as anything short of a surrender of the interests of the people of the United States. Also, it is my personal view that now would be the best time to consider whether any arrangement that would give up to European nations the power to fix or to control the vital matter of prosperity and price levels would not produce, if and when understood by the people of the United States, most violent reactions both political and social. Especially might this be the natural result throughout the entire producing sections of the United States and in fact everywhere where the maintenance of price levels that bring prosperity are vital to the interest of the people.

I am enclosing a copy of a letter to Secretary George H. Dern for your information, which has some bearing on this subject, and I should like very much, at your leisure, to have confirmation from you as to the matter therein contained.

Knowing how very busy you must be, I would hesitate to burden you with this matter, but I feel sure you will agree that it is vital to the interests of this Nation to leave no stone unturned to protect us in this Conference from what might prove to be serious blunders. The time is short during which we can give consideration to such questions, and I know you realize my deep interest and concern as to them.

I sincerely trust that everything will work out at the Conference so as to protect the peace and prosperity of the world at large, as well as the interests of the United States, by agreements that will secure to the people of the world prosperity price levels without involving the United States in any relinquishment of her constitutional rights in this matter; but, if it is necessary for the United States to choose between putting her neck in the European noose in this matter or taking individual action, I hope you will realize that individual action is open to us and that under no circumstances should we yield up the power to European countries to control monetary values and world price levels so vital to the interest of the United States and other producing nations.

With personal regards and best wishes, I beg to remain,

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN JANNEY.

MAY 26, 1934.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR PITTMAN: I have your letter of the 23d instant and note what you say with reference to the present situation and the immateriality of what Mr. Janney thinks.

As you no doubt know, I am not interested in the slightest degree in silver as such. I would not walk across the street to put silver to $1.50 an ounce if it were not for the economic considerations that I believe to be involved in silver's use for America's welfare.

I am not interested at all in the legislation upon the ground that "it is all we can get." I must respectfully dissent from your view, if that is your actuating motive. How do you know what we can get unless we try? To my mind, great principles are here involved, and I for one, and if I am the only one, will never sacrifice those principles on the altar of "the best we can get", and I am especially unwilling to sacrifice those principles when the prosperity, if not the safety, of this Nation is concerned.

With the utmost respect for you and for Senators WHEELER, BORAH, ADAMS, KING, and THOMAS, whom I know not to be all in agreement, I want to say that the proposal made by the administration, if it is adopted, will turn out to be the "hottest potato" that the so-called "silver Senators" ever carried back to their constituents. The foregoing must not be interpreted in any sense as a threat from me, as I shall do nothing except to air my views here in Washington, and not in any personal way, but the proposal itself, if enacted into law, will carry within itself its own political devastation.

Yesterday morning I read in the Washington Herald, under the signature of my good friend Senator WHEELER, his expressions of doubt about this bill, and he has not told the half of it. If I were permitted to add some views of my own, I should say it is built entirely upon political expediency and with the purpose of destroying whatever confidence the people may have in the use of silver as an instrument of economic defense against exploiting and despoiling nations.

I know full well that if the Congress of the United States had the backbone to do its constitutional duty and would be willing to make a fight to preserve its constitutional status, the faulty proposal sent to us by the administration would not be all that we could get.

With the great respect that I have for the President of the United States, I can only say that he has "muffed the ball", in the language of the street, and in my judgment is going to wreck the Democratic Party and perhaps the country—not purposely, of course; and this will come about, I think, because he has listened to advisers who are steering him in his course to ruin and has been unwilling to listen to the other side.

I stand for the principle, and I am willing to fight for it, that the Congress of the United States take away from the hands of the international bankers the power to control the purchasing power of gold in the interests of the American producer and consumer, debtor, and creditor, and in order to do that it is necessary that we use silver, making it full legal tender, at its world-accepted value, keeping gold as the standard of value.

Assuring you of my appreciation of your letter, I am

Sincerely yours,

WM. L. FIESINGER, M.C.

THE WILLARD HOTEL,
Washington, D.C., June 3, 1933.

Hon. GEORGE H. DERN,
Secretary of War, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DERN: Yesterday we were discussing a way for America to find protection from European plans to dominate our economic affairs. In the course of this conversation you quoted Senator KEY PITTMAN, of Nevada, as saying that he had discussed with me at length my proposal relating to this matter.

I wish to confirm my statement that at no time has Senator PITTMAN ever discussed with me this proposal, even in the briefest conversation. In fact, since my proposal of an American plan, which was first made to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, on April 12 and 13, 1932, I have been unable to arrange an interview with Senator PITTMAN.

I have written him several letters proposing a conference with him and other Senators whom he might feel were interested in the subject, always with some excuse from him telling why he did not then wish to have such a conference. Also I have visited Senator PITTMAN'S office a number of times, hoping to confer with him personally, and on at least three occasions have left with his secretary my card and address.

But never since my testimony of April 1932 has Senator PITTMAN accorded the privilege of a conference with him, and under no circumstances did I ever, prior to that time, divulge my suggested American plan to him or to anyone else, not even to my most intimate personal associates. I wanted my proposal to be made known first to the American Congress before it could possibly be known to European governments.

My reason for this was that I considered my suggestion completely defensive to America in its economic position and that without any doubt or question it afforded America an opportunity, by prompt action and acting alone among the nations, to defend her monetary system and price level so necessary to American prosperity, from manipulation by European governments. No one so far has seriously questioned that this plan would put America in position to completely dominate world price levels in terms of gold values.

On the other hand, European nations, who at that time (April 1932) were rejecting and refusing all our proposals for an international conference, might quickly change their position. They might favor an economic conference of their own calling, and so gain the initiative and at the same time make more difficult such independent American action.

This in point of fact is just what they did. After my proposing this plan to the committee, England within 60 days announced a call for a conference at a future date within her control. I wished the American Congress, through their investigating committee, to have at least equal priority of notice with foreign governments, and for this reason kept this proposal absolutely to myself until it was made to the committee.

It is therefore impossible that I could have had any conversation with Senator PITTMAN on this very important subject, and any statement that he might make or opinion that he might form based on the impression that he has discussed this matter with me is a delusion.

This is most unfortunate. Senator PITTMAN is one citizen of the Nation who should have first-hand knowledge and first-hand explanation of any plan that would defend America, in her peculiar economic position, from European aggressions in the matter of their use of silver to control values, in the way so ably pointed out by Mr. Montagu Norman in his testimony before the Hilton-Young Commission.

There is so great misunderstanding and so much confusion that is constantly being circulated on this important subject that a personal explanation is generally necessary for an understanding of this American plan. But, on the other hand, when fully explained, either to individuals or groups, or, indeed, to public gatherings, this plan meets with general acceptance and approval.

It is the only plan yet proposed that offers to the United States the power to control and dominance in the important matters of world values of gold which are reflected by the commodity price level. It defends America from European manipulations of our price levels. It holds dominance in the matter of prosperity or depression as far as gold values in terms of property values are concerned. And what is more important still, no economists or statesmen have yet come forward to debate or dispute the claim that full power resides in the United States Government, under this plan, to fully defend prosperity price levels.

Congressman FIESINGER, of Ohio, who is the author of 3 House bills embodying this plan, 1 in the present Congress and 2 in the previous Congress, has written to 140 leading economists who reside in nearly every State in the Union, and he informs me that in no single instance have serious objections been urged to the principles set out in this plan, and it is quite generally believed by those who have studied and who understand the plan that no serious objection can be urged to it if open to rebuttal or debate.

It is most significant that a plan in the interest of America and opposed to the organized financial interests of Europe should find difficulty in gaining audience anywhere in America, especially from its political leaders and its statesmen who are charged with any special responsibility in these matters, and yet such statements as you have quoted from Senator PITTMAN would naturally make it difficult, if not impossible, for such a proposal to gain a sympathetic audience from yourself or others in authority.

In the December 1931 issue of the official magazine of the American Institute of Mining Engineers was published an article in which I drew a distinction between class B nations, nations who are interested in lower price levels, and class A nations who produce for export commodities and raw materials. In that article I recommended international action among class A nations for the protection of price levels vital to their position, in order to draw out, if I could, the position of leading Americans on the point of a conflict of interest between America and Europe and the dangers that would lie in any conference dominated by Europeans.

I had the pleasure of an interview with Senator PITTMAN shortly after that, in February 1932, with the view of presenting the plan which was put forward in this article and explaining the type of international action proposed which maintained gold as a standard of value and which set up a use for silver as an international money through an international bank dominated by the class A nations.

But I held in reserve any plan or proposal indicating that America acting alone could take any such action and at no time was any such possibility discussed, or even mentioned.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN JANNEY.

Senator PITTMAN, of Nevada,
Congressman FIESINGER, of Ohio,
Congressman LAMNECK, of Ohio.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., June 19, 1933.

Hon. JAMES M. COX,
Member United States Delegation,
World Economic and Monetary Conference,
London, England.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR COX: Congratulations on your election as Chairman of the Monetary Committee! I am sure this is the most important committee that will be appointed by the Conference.

I am taking the liberty of enclosing a letter written to Mr. George H. Dern as a result of a conference we had with him on the monetary question. I am also enclosing a copy of a letter that was written to Senator PITTMAN on the same subject. This letter was also prompted by our interview with Mr. Dern. They are both self-explanatory. You will also find enclosed a copy of the brief submitted to the President at his request, as a result of our interview with him some time ago.

I was delighted yesterday when I learned that President Roosevelt had refused to accept the plans for stabilization of the pound and dollar and franc as suggested by Great Britain and France. To stabilize the pound and dollar on any other basis than 4.86 for the pound and 1.00 for the dollar would, in my judgment, be absolute suicide for the United States. Most of us who have given the subject thought from our standpoint are hoping and praying that no stabilization agreement will be entered into. If this happens, America will be free to control the value of gold on her own initiative, and this, in turn, will permit her to have any price level that she might desire, independent of any action taken by any foreign country.

In the most important position that you occupy, I hope you will give the plan that we have suggested your earnest consideration, because it is the only plan that will accomplish the results that America wants. This plan was submitted to 150 economists, and not one of them was able to point out a single defect in the proposal.

I hope, too, that no agreement will be made with the foreign countries as to the pegging of the price of silver, because silver is the weapon we expect to use to control the value of gold, and we must be free to buy such quantities as are necessary to accomplish this result and, in turn, to sell in such quantities as are necessary to keep the value of gold at its normal level. If we are permitted this freedom of action, the United States can go back on gold at any time it wants to; and then if silver were put in our reserves according to the plan that we are proposing, we could control the value of gold and thereby have a price level which would mean prosperity to the United States.

Before Dr. Sprague went to London, Congressman FIESINGER and the writer had a very pleasant interview with him on this subject, although we were not in position to go into much detail, and we asked him what he thought of the Senator's plan of fixing the price of silver at 60 cents an ounce. He said, in his judgment, it would not do any good at all.

America is looking to our delegation in London with greater interest than she has looked to any group of men in the history of the United States, because in your hands rests the future welfare and prosperity of this country, and if no mistakes are made in any agreement with foreign countries, the United States will soon emerge from this depression a greater and more prosperous Nation than ever before.

You have my very best wishes in your endeavors, and I am happy that you occupy the key position that you do.

I am sending you, also, a copy of a speech delivered by me in the House of Representatives on this subject, which includes the proposed legislation on the matter; also a speech of Congressman FIESINGER and the testimony of John Janney, our economic adviser. You may not agree with me, but in the opinion of experts, and in my opinion, Mr. Janney is the best-qualified man on this subject in the United States, and I urge you to give what he says your earnest consideration, because in his proposal you will find a way out.

With kindest personal wishes to you, I am,

Very truly yours,

A. P. LAMNECK, M.C.

JANUARY 22, 1934.

Hon. ROBERT J. BULKLEY,

United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BULKLEY: I have thought for 2 days about writing you a letter on the subject of the money bill now before the Senate and when I came to the office this morning the urge was so strong that I have followed its dictates.

The money bill passed by the House, and for which I voted, was the most revolutionary piece of legislation ever presented to an American Congress. My vote on this bill was the only vote that I have made during my term of Congress in which I have a real regret. The methods used in passing the bill were a disgrace to the American Congress. The bill was presented to the House one evening and quite a discussion occurred as to who should have jurisdiction, the Coinage, Weights, and Measures, or the Banking and Currency Committee. A decision was finally made, and rightfully so, that it was a Coinage, Weights and Measures Committee bill.

The next morning the Chairman of the Coinage, Weights and Measures Committee had a report all written reporting the bill out of the committee before even members of the committee had an opportunity to read the bill or before the chairman of the committee even read it. The report was submitted to the Congress and our Democratic floor leader attempted to give the bill a preferred status, but because of so much opposition, it was delayed a day or two. The Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee then decided to have a few hearings to make it look as if the bill was considered.

Have you ever heard in your legislative experience, or has any other Congressman or Senator, ever heard of a bill being reported out of a committee without the slightest consideration and then having hearings afterward which were not taken into consideration in the slightest degree in considering the bill? It is a disgrace to the American Congress to have such procedure.

President Roosevelt said in many of his speeches that he wanted to restore the 1926 price level, he wanted sound money, he wanted a dollar that would have a stabilized purchasing power from one generation to the next, and he also wanted a money system that would take the money question out of the hands of the money changers. In my humble opinion, not a single objective stated above will be accomplished under this bill. It will leave the money question in the hands of the international bankers, it will not restore the price level, it will not control the value of gold, which, after all, must be done if we are going to have anything like stability. All experts agree on this point.

I urge you to give serious consideration to this legislation and invite your particular attention to two amendments to this bill, one offered by me which was rejected, and one printed in the RECORD that was prepared by Congressman FIESINGER, of Ohio, but which he did not present because of the fact that the steam roller was working to perfection and he knew that it was a hopeless case. With these two amendments adopted, the bill will accomplish the objectives of the President.

If you want some real information on the money problem, I should like to suggest an interview with a man who knows more about it than any other man in this country. His services are available to you any time you suggest, and I am sure that he can enlighten you as he has many Members in the House and also in the Senate, and I am sure that in the debates that will occur this week many of his proposals will be presented by Senators from whom we would least expect them to come.

I hope you will excuse me for writing you at this length on this most important subject.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR P. LAMNECK, M.C.

APRIL 12, 1934.

Hon. ELMER THOMAS,

United States Senator.

MY DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: Will it be an imposition for me to write you in regard to the Thomas amendment to the Dies bill?

The entire Ohio Democratic delegation, 18 Members, have backed up silver legislation in the House. I have myself made several speeches on the subject and am forwarding you under another cover copies of same. From them you can see how intensely interested I am in the question.

I believe I reflect the views of the members of my entire delegation when I say that the reason we have been in favor of silver is because of the way it has been presented to the House.

The Coinage Committee has voted down every bill that gives us a fixed ratio. Both the Fiesinger bill and the Dies bill have a principle of silver certificate with the full gold value which gives America control of silver and gold.

It is with regret that I note you have passed out a bill that involves the principle of a fixed ratio and especially a ratio of 371½ grains of silver to 14 grains of gold, which is about a 25-to-1 ratio.

In view of the fact that the Coinage Committee has voted against a fixed ratio of principle—especially as a fixed ratio of principle has always failed at the polls—it is with real regret that your amendment does not take advantage of the principle in the Dies bill of a silver certificate of full value which would give America control of money.

If we had a fixed ratio of 14½ to 1, which would give us a high price level and not leave room for the manipulation of Europe, I might favor this; but a fixed ratio of 25 to 1 in principle would leave Europe in control, destroying the present opportunity of unseating the international bankers, and I doubt if we will ever get another.

With great respect, I am,

Sincerely yours,

A. P. LAMNECK, M.C.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
April 16, 1934.

Hon. A. P. LAMNECK,

House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LAMNECK: I thank you for your favor of the 12th and appreciate the frank statement of your position. In the Senate we had to get some compromise agreed to or the bill could not have reached the Senate proper.

I am trying to help silver and will gladly accept any plan that can be agreed upon. The Janney-Fiesinger plan would be acceptable to me, yet we have proponents in the Senate who are demanding an outright 16 to 1 ratio, which would force the price of silver up so that an ounce, as measured by gold, would be worth approximately $2.18. I could not go that strong and, for that reason, suggested the lower ratio of silver at the ultimate value of $1.29 an ounce. I feel that we are making progress and hope for favorable results.

Yours most cordially,

ELMER THOMAS.

APRIL 24, 1934.

Hon. ELMER THOMAS,

United States Senator, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your letter of April 16, received in my absence, I have studied the silver question and I think I understand it.

Silver is a great force in the money world. It can be used to bring about depression. It can be used to bring about prosperity. Who shall control such a force for happiness and contentment among the people of the world, or who will control this force for misery, depravity, revolution, and world conflict?

The international banker now controls, and for over 100 years has controlled. The Constitution assigns the power for this control to Congress, and the issue in this conflict of power should be one as between Congress and the international banker if the issue can be put in the form of a bill.

The Fiesinger bill raises this issue. It gives a clean-cut issue and gives to the Government of this Nation this power. The House has been overwhelmingly in favor of it. The Wheeler amendment to the gold bill incorporated this same principle and gave this same issue to the Congress. I believe you will agree that the Senate was in favor of it when it voted 43 to 45 in spite of the direct request of President Roosevelt not to place such an amendment onto his bill.

You say some Senators wanted 16 to 1. Of course, this is true, but the House does not want such a bill, and such a bill has not been passed out of the committee. Do these Senators understand that any fixed ratio gives limited power of control to this Government?

Are you for America or are you for the international banker? That is the issue that should be raised. Those who are for American control of money values should be allowed to vote for it, leaving those to vote against it who wish to do so.

Such a bill is before you in the Fiesinger bill. Why cannot your committee endorse the principles of this bill and send it onto the floor of Congress when you now have every evidence that the majority of Congress is in favor of American control and against European control?

I will study carefully your answer to this question and in conclusion I will say that I am very sorry I did not have the opportunity to appear before your committee and was not allowed the privilege of explaining my reasons for what I have stated in this letter, and if your committee still wishes to study this question from the standpoint of the international banker versus the American people, I will be very glad to appear before your committee and give you the benefit of my study of this question, and I am sure there are other Members of this Congress that would also like to have the privilege of giving to the Senate the study that certain Members of the House have made of this question.

Cordially and sincerely yours,

A. P. LAMNECK, M.C.

Hon. ARTHUR P. LAMNECK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have your good letter of the 24th, and thank you most sincerely for the suggestions therein given me.

With every good wish, I am,
Sincerely your friend,

ELMER THOMAS.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, when the Dies bill was before the House I supported it. There was something concrete in that bill. We had the assurance that it would tend to increase the exporting of surplus farm products. In this bill we have no such assurance, we have nothing concrete. Whatever may be said of this bill, it is not a monetary bill. My honest judgment is that this bill is a new form of a relief measure. I am not sure whether it is a relief measure for the President, to save him from embarrassment from the politicians from the silver States, or a relief measure for Representatives and Senators from the silver States who are candidates for reelection. They can take this bill and fool their people into believing that it is a silver bill. It will doubtless take a length of time beyond November for the people in the silver States to find out that they have been humbugged by this bill.

When you read the bill it is perfectly apparent that there is nothing mandatory in it. It only provides for the use of silver as its ultimate object. How long is it going to take to carry out the ultimate object? In the next place, this bill is not necessary at all. The Thomas amendment gives the President full power to do this. It gives him the power to go as far as 16 to 1, to buy silver in virtually unlimited amounts. Yet the President has not used the Thomas amendment, although he has had a year to do so. Therefore, all you can say there is to the bill is that there must be something passed here for silver on the eve of election. The votes from the silver States must be caught.

Furthermore, it is indeed a money-tinkering bill. If we are going to pass monetary legislation, then let Congress pass legislation which is mandatory, which is outright monetary legislation, and be done with it when it is passed. Talk about uncertainty! If the President ever turns his hand to put this bill into effect, it will be the worst kind of uncertainty with no end to it. The administration started this money tinkering last fall, buying a little gold every now and then. Then the President came to Congress with a gold devaluation bill and said that we had to have it in order to stop the money tinkering. Of course that was not necessary. He had full power under the Thomas amendment to devalue the gold dollar without further legislation.

I have been much interested this afternoon in the discussion, particularly the remarks of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] about the Republican crime of 1873. If you have to talk politics on a silver bill, then I ask this question: If the Republican Party committed a crime in 1873 by demonetizing silver, why have not some of the Democratic Congresses since that time corrected that crime? Why did the Democratic Party under Woodrow Wilson, with full control of both Houses for 6 years, go along without correcting that crime of 1873? Why through the two administrations of Grover Cleveland did the Democratic Party refuse to correct the crime of 1873? The truth is that this Congress is not passing a bill to remonetize silver.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I cannot yield now. If you want to remonetize silver, why not do it now? You have both Houses of Congress. This is not a remonetizing bill. The reason you will not remonetize silver is because your President will not stand for it. There has not been a Democratic President since 1873 who was not opposed to remonetizing silver. Franklin D. Roosevelt is opposed to remonetizing silver. Otherwise he would do so by Executive order. Under the Thomas amendment he has for 12 long months had full power to remonetize silver. He could correct the so-called "crime of 1873." It is very evident that he does not regard the demonetizing of silver in 1873 as a crime. It is very evident from his record that he favors the former demonetizing of silver and is now opposed to remonetizing silver.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I believe the gentleman from Ohio made the statement that the Dies bill which was reported——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman cannot do that in Committee of the Whole. I make the point of order that the question of personal privilege cannot be raised in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I think we can dispose of this matter in a minute.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. Ordinarily that is true; but whenever the question of personal privilege grows out of an offense which occurred in the Committee of the Whole, the Member offended has a right to rise to a question of personal privilege in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I cannot accept that interpretation of the rule.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman will find precedents to that effect.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, in order to save time, I will withdraw the point for the moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of personal privilege is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States that the proportion of silver to gold in the monetary stocks of the United States should be increased, with the ultimate objective of having and maintaining, one-fourth of the monetary value of such stocks in silver.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLER: In lien 9, page 1, strike out the word "fourth" and substitute the word "half" therefor.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to talk a minute about what silver means as a practical, everyday matter. We are trying, or ought to be trying to put men to work in this country. It is the money in our pay rolls that makes prosperity—money that will pay debts and buy the things we want. When we put all our men to work, our difficulties will be over. Unless and until we do that, they will not be. I happen to be one of the few men, perhaps, in this House who hammered a drill in a silver mine when I was a young chap. That does not necessarily make me very wise on the subject, but it has been my opportunity and pleasure to spend a good many years of my life in the mining business, and having direct connection with and being interested in the question of silver, I have been compelled to study it somewhat. I only want to call attention to the fact that following the repeal clause of the Sherman Act in 1893, while the great panic of that year was already on, and the depression that follows every panic was at its worst, as the result of that repeal I stood by and saw 250,000 men thrown out of work in the silver mines in the Western States. Coxey's army which came east was drawn from these men. It was an unplanned shifting of a large population which of necessity drifted east to enter into compulsory competition with the very men whose jobs had been dependent on these silver miners.

Let us get this thing clear: Every time you put a man to work underground, mining precious metals, you thereby put to work nine men on top of the ground to supply that man with the things he needs. This is a well-recognized economic fact. When you threw a quarter of a million men out of work directly as a result of stopping the silver mining in the West, you threw out of work 2,000,000 other men engaged in industry all over the country dependent on that quarter of a million actual miners who were dispossessed. It naturally follows that if we put a quarter of a million miners back to work, we can be sure that another 2,000,000 idle men will be put back to work again.

Until we awake to plain common sense, there is little use standing here and making speeches and arguments about the theory of it. I want to put men to work. I am for the things that will put men to work, and I am going to keep on being for them, because it is the only way out of this depression.

There is no use fooling ourselves about it. What do I hear? Two splendid gentlemen got up here and read a part of Grover Cleveland's message on the repeal of the Sherman purchasing law in 1893. What is the point to it? I point out that the conditions were entirely and absolutely different from what they are today. The argument therefore does not apply. At that time the unfortunate fact was that we were on the gold standard. Today we are not. At that time you could go to the Treasury and demand gold and get it under the law. Today you cannot. Therefore, the difficulty of the whole thing lay just there—that as long as they kept purchasing silver you go to the Treasury and pull the gold out.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The greatest explanation is that Cleveland was wrong on that proposition.

Mr. KELLER. Certainly. But, for argument's sake, let us suppose him to have been right. At the present time we are not on the gold standard, thank God. At the present time we are wisely off the gold standard as we ought to have been a long time ago. If you put a billion ounces or five billion ounces of silver into the Treasury at the present time you could not draw out a penny of gold. But, we are having the same thing, constantly, giving citations from speeches that have absolutely no application to the matter in hand at this time. It is nonsense. One of these days when I am at leisure, I am going to go back and dig out from that great Democrat whom I love so dearly, Thomas Jefferson, a lot of things he said to great advantage then, that would sound like idiocy if an attempt to apply them to present conditions were made today. I am trying to illustrate the unfortunate practice in this House of trying to quote to us from old, dead things that have no possible connection with the thing we have in hand. The thing we ought to consider here today is, What is going to be the effect of this bill? What is it going to do for us? Will it put anybody to work? If it will, let us pass it. If not, let us not do it.

To recapitulate, if the gold standard were now in operation, some of the objections of my friends over here on the Republican side would, of course, be entirely valid. But it is not, and all the arguments against the Dies bill based on that presumption are so inapplicable as to be quite ridiculous.

In fact, the present use of gold is entirely limited to international trade settlements, and that use is in no wise vital to our financial recovery or maintenance of prosperity in this country, once we bring it back. Because the international trade balance is always in our favor; that is, we always sell more to foreign countries than we buy from them, so that at the end of the year we have always received more than we paid out. Each year this balance is added to our gold supply, and none is ever taken out.

There is no reason in fact why we should not do exactly for silver what we are doing for gold—set the price wherever we find it best and pile it up alongside the gold in the Treasury and add to it each year what we produce, and what we receive each year from our trade balances from the three-quarters of the people of the world who use silver largely to the exclusion of any other money. No possible financial harm could come from it. It would add tremendously to our circulating cash money through the full legal-tender silver certificates which would be issued for every ounce of it. We ought to understand by this time that business enterprise is starving for lack of money with which to carry on, upon which to found the credit necessary to business revival.

We have gone far in establishing the right principles of money. Whether conscious of it or not, our money is purely fiat and will always remain so if we retain our economic sanity. The nations of the world may make an agreement on ratios between the metals, but that will be for international use alone. That prices within our country can be affected by any valuation we may place upon gold or silver is thoroughly disproven.

The success or failure of this bill when it becomes the law will depend entirely upon its administration. If it is administered up to the letter and spirit of the law, it will be of tremendous benefit. It will ultimately give permanent employment to more than 2,000,000 men—not in the West alone, as some of my colleagues seem to think.

It will give work to the men in the machine shops, to the growers of cotton and wool, to the spinners and weavers, to the makers of clothing, to the steel workers, to the auto and truck builders, to the coal miners, the oil drillers, and the railroad men in every State in the Union. It will produce pay rolls, create new wealth, bring prosperity, give jobs, establish and maintain security for a million families in the reestablishment of this old and honorable industry.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take 5 minutes, but I want to call attention to this fact, that I am not sure whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] is serious in this amendment or not; but if the gentleman wants legislation that will go further than we have gone up to this time for silver and in the interest of the workingman, then we must adopt this bill with its provision of one-fourth to three-fourths, as between silver and gold, or else we will not make any progress at all. I therefore ask that the amendment be voted down.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I simply want to call to the attention of the gentleman from Washingon and others the statement appearing on page 2 of the report which I think sheds a great deal of light on this question; that is, that the provision of this bill of 25 percent is about the mean or average amount that has prevailed over the last 50 years. Certainly, that is the basis upon which we should hold this present provision in the bill.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be heard on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts, a member of the committee.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, not to speak to the amendment, but in connection with some of the remarks made by the gentleman from North Carolina. The gentleman from North Carolina asked to be not interrupted, and I respected his request and did not interrupt him; but I should like to call attention to one or two of his statements. The gentleman stated that the minority views were "peanut" politics. That is not the fact. No information was available to either the majority or to the minority side. If, therefore, the majority side endeavored to elucidate any facts in their report, I say their report is "jumbo peanut" politics, because they had nothing upon which to base it. I realize that we on this side of the aisle constitute a minority group. We therefore take the small end of the peanut and give the majority the jumbo part.

The gentleman from North Carolina said further that no one asked for an open hearing. Who ever before heard of such an important piece of legislation as this upon which there were not open hearings, particularly when the right bower of the administration, the Secretary of the Treasury, was known to be the witness expected to appear? It was assumed, of course, by the members of the committee, that we were to have an open hearing, but when we got there we found it was an executive session.

The gentleman from North Carolina said that nobody asked to be heard. The bill was introduced one afternoon and reported almost the next afternoon. I explained the length of time in my previous remarks. There was no chance for anybody to ask to be heard. The gentleman states that ample time was given. What is ample time? On Friday morning I asked if we could have witnesses appear, and I was told that the hearing was not to be a debating society. They did not want to know the opposition to the bill. It was enough for them to be told that it was an administration matter; and they put the O.K. of the Committee on Ways and Means upon it. There was no opportunity whatever to invite anybody to appear. Friday afternoon at 4:30, as a great concession, the chairman of the committee said that if I had a witness he would be heard at 10 o'clock the next morning. At 4:30 I wired an authority on monetary matters in Princeton, N.J., Professor Kemmerer, but inasmuch as he does not belong to the "brain trust", his testimony probably in the estimation of the administration is no good. So far as the public is concerned, however, his views are extremely valuable. The telegram did not reach Professor Kemmerer until Saturday afternoon, as he had been away on a western trip; and Saturday afternoon, forsooth, the committee was in executive session and reporting out the bill. Of course there was ample time from 4:30 one afternoon until noon the next day in which to secure witnesses from all over the United States, but even the fastest airplane would not have sufficient speed to get them here by the time the chairman of the committee said they must be here.

Mr. Chairman, this is all I care to say in connection with the matter.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of answering the gentleman from Ohio, who, if I understood him correctly, stated that the Chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures wrote a report on the Dies bill before that bill was heard in the committee.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I yield.

Mr. LAMNECK. I did not make such a statement.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. I thought the gentleman did.

Mr. FIESINGER. Was it not the gold bill?

Mr. SOMERS of New York. It is not true as to the gold bill, either. I emphatically deny both implications.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, any legislation that deals with monetary matters is always of interest to me, because I am as certain as I am standing here that our money situation is the cause of practically all of the troubles we are facing now in a financial way.

MEDIUM OF EXCHANGE IMPERATIVE FOR RECOVERY

Without a medium of exchange which is representative of value, I do not care how many public-works programs are sponsored by the Government, they will not get the country back on its feet in a financial way without inflation of the currency and a restoration of our medium of exchange.

This bill is not favored by the silver people; and I fail to see at this time how it can be effective in remedying our scarcity of media of exchange.

THE SALE OF LARGE AMOUNTS OF UNITED STATES BONDS WILL RUIN ANY MONETARY PROGRAM

Let us suppose that this week we coin $1,000,000,000 in silver and scatter it wherever we have national obligations to meet. It goes into the banks over the country. Suppose, further, that next week we sell $1,000,000,000 of bonds. We will take up that silver; the amounts will exactly offset each other, and we will be no better off, so far as circulating media are concerned, than we were before the $1,000,000,000 of silver was coined.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Would not that silver have to be purchased by the Treasury before it could be coined, and would not the silver producers benefit to the extent of $1,000,000,000?

Mr. BUSBY. That is another question. The gentleman comes from Idaho and wants the silver producers put into business. That is another question.

Mr. Chairman, about 0.1 of the medium of exchange used by business in this country is currency; about 0.9 is bank credit. This bank credit is bank-check money that is used in transacting business. The 0.1 cannot possibly stay in circulation as long as the machinery that issues the 0.9, the banks, can take it up and swap it for Government bonds. There is no use arguing about this, for the Government bonds are paid for in currency or its equivalent. I do not think anybody will contend that it is possible to have silver, greenbacks, Federal Reserve notes, or any other kind of currency as long as the Government issues more bonds than there is currency outstanding, because the bonds absorb the currency, absorb the bank-check money, absorb the bank deposits, and the sale of bonds keeps up a continual process of deflation. Wherever I have gone when Government work has been discontinued business activity dies and all prosperity it over as soon as the Government funds are spent. We will never recover by creating bond debts and other debts to hang around the necks of the people.

This bill, like the gold bill, contains heavy penalties which to my mind are entirely out of line with our principles of government.

ONLY MONEY IN THE HANDS OF THE PEOPLE WILL HELP RECOVERY

What difference does it make if we have a block of gold in the Treasury and today we label the gold $4,000,000,000 and next week we go down and tear the label off and label it as being worth $8,000,000,000? It is not in circulation. It is not playing any part in our currency scarcity. Of course, it is down there and it is well to have the gold, because the foreign countries that trade with us and accept gold in payment know we have the gold. It is a block of confidence, but so far as it being worth anything as a basis for currency, that is preposterous.

I hear the economists talking about sound money.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUSBY. I was talking with some economists the other day, and they said they were for some kind of sound money. I said, "There is not one of you that knows what you mean when you say 'sound money.' You do not know what you mean, and you do not know what you want." They said, "What do you think it is?" I said, "I am not the one that is making the proposal." The only money in existence today that is not purely fiat money is the silver certificate which does have some degree of commodity value back of it. The silver certificate is the only money in this country that is not purely fiat money. They talk about issuing greenbacks. You may look on any piece of paper money you have in your pocket and it is nothing but a promise to pay in either silver or else it is printing-press money.

ALL GOVERNMENT BOND SALES ARE DEFLATION

It is perfectly preposterous to think that we can ever recover from our downward trend by selling bonds and creating additional Government debts that must be met by the taxpayers in the future. This bill and the gold bill or any other bill that does not supply additional media of exchange, that does not shake the banks loose and put them back into their proper field of operations, will accomplish nothing; and we ought to recognize this fact at the earliest possible time.

Mr. MAY. In view of the gentleman's statement that the silver certificate is about the only money that has any value, may I ask the gentleman if he thinks when the bill expands the base and authorizes the purchase of more silver it will aid the situation in that respect?

Mr. BUSBY. I think the bill is wholly impracticable as a base for the expansion of currency. There is no coherency or logic in one step following the other.

At this point I desire to set forth a short bill introduced by me which to my mind is a true worth-while silver bill.

A REAL SILVER BILL THAT WOULD ACCOMPLISH SOMETHING

H.R. 9242

A bill to provide for the purchase of silver, issue legal-tender certificates thereon, and to buy and sell silver so as to keep the purchasing power of 371¼ grains of pure silver equal to the purchasing power of 23.22 grains of pure gold, and to increase the metallic monetary base

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase silver bullion at the rate of not less than 50,000,000 ounces per month, until there shall be added to the monetary resources of the United States 1,000,000,000 ounces of silver, except that whenever 371¼ grains of pure silver equals in purchasing power 23.22 grains of pure gold the purchase of silver under this act shall be suspended. At any time the purchasing power of 371¼ grains of pure silver goes below the purchasing power of 23.22 grains of pure gold the purchase of silver shall be resumed and continued until the purchasing power of said amount of silver is restored to equal the purchasing power of said amount of gold; and this shall be done from time to time to keep the purchasing power of silver to gold in the relation provided above.

If the purchasing power of 371¼ grains of pure silver rises above the purchasing power of 23.22 grains of pure gold, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall sell silver until the purchasing power of said amount of silver equals the purchasing power of said amount of gold; and this shall be done from time to time to keep the purchasing power of silver to gold in the relation provided above.

Such silver shall be purchased, at home or abroad, wherever silver shall be procurable at or under the value specified above, with any direct obligations, coin, or currency of the United States authorized by law, or with any funds held by the Secretary of the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem most advantageous to the public interest; and the silver so purchased shall be held in reserve by the Secretary of the Treasury against the issue of certificates of deposit payable to bearer, as hereinafter provided. Such silver certificates shall be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in an amount which in the aggregate shall equal the cost of such silver to the Secretary of the Treasury. Upon presentation of any such silver certificates the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem the same in silver bullion at the prevailing market price or in the circulating currency of the United States. The silver certificates issued under the provisions of this act shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues.

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect on the 1st day of the succeeding month after its enactment, or sooner by proclamation of the President.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short bill that I introduced on the silver question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAMNECK) there were—ayes 59, noes 42.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote just taken in the committee discloses that a quorum is present.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers on the previous vote.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the vote disclosed that a quorum is present, and the Chair has so ruled. The gentleman's demand for tellers therefore comes too late.

Mr. MOTT. I do not think the vote is correct, and I demand tellers.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The request of the gentleman from Oregon comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is too late to call for tellers, because a point of no quorum was made and the Chair overruled the point of no quorum; therefore it is too late to ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announced the presence of a quorum and stated the question was on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois before he heard any request for tellers.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman from Michigan understood the Chair to announce that there were 50 ayes and 42 noes.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote was 59 to 42.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCGUGIN) there were—ayes 7, noes 63.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is dilatory, because it has not been 2 minutes since the Chair ruled that there was a quorum present.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. DOUGHTON and Mr. KELLER to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 10, noes 80.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. The Chair observed a number of Members in the Chamber not voting. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-five Members present, a quorum.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FIESINGER: In line 9, page 1, strike out the word "fourth" and insert in lieu thereof the word "third."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAMNECK: Page 1, line 9, after the word "silver", strike out the period, insert a comma and the following: "which one-fourth of said monetary stock is hereby declared primary money and is hereby given legal-tender privileges to the extent of its world-accepted market value, under rules and regulations which shall be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be free from artificial limitations or restraints."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase silver, at home or abroad, for present or future delivery with any direct obligations, coin, or currency of the United States, authorized by law, or with any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, at such rates, at such times, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest: Provided, That no purchase of silver shall be made hereunder (a) at a price in excess of the monetary value thereof or (b) whenever and so long as the monetary value of the stocks of silver is equal to or greater than 25 percent of the monetary value of the stocks of gold and silver: And provided further, That no purchases of silver situated in the continental United States on May 1, 1934, shall be made hereunder at a price in excess of 50 cents a fine ounce.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the word "The" and insert "Whenever and so long as the proportion of silver in the stocks of gold and silver of the United States is less than one-fourth of the monetary value of such stocks, the."

Page 2, line 9, strike out "(a)"; and beginning at the end of line 10, strike out "or (b) whenever and so long as the monetary value of the stocks of silver is equal to or greater than 25 percent of the monetary value of the stocks of gold and silver."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the first committee amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment that requires the Secretary of the Treasury to buy enough silver at such times and in such manner as he may determine to be in the public interest as will be necessary to make the stock of silver one-fourth of the monetary reserves in the Treasury.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] very clearly explained this situation and showed why this bill will not do any good, but will simply tie up a lot of Government credit and Government money.

We should not adopt this amendment and require one-fourth of the monetary stock of metal in the Treasury to be silver. We should vote this down; and if the bill has got to pass, we should let it go on the basis that the Secretary of the Treasury shall buy it when in the public interest he thinks this should be done.

When the gold bill was up in March, the Secretary of the Treasury said:

As you gentlemen know, we have a $2,000,000,000 fund to stabilize American currency, but it is just impossible to tell what the future will be as to how best to handle this. I believe we need more experience and more time to tell us what is the best way to handle the monetary problem of this country before we get into as definite and as fixed a permanent policy as is outlined in this bill.

Yet we are told by the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that this is a part of a definite monetary program that was in mind at the time the gold bill was passed.

A little later on the Secretary was asked, and this appears at page 389:

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Do you object to stating your specific reasons for that, if you have any?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. It is simply because we do not know enough about it. We want the benefit of at least a year's experience with the present program we are on.

Now, it is perfectly apparent that the only possible beneficiaries of this proposition are those who are now mining silver and the foreigners who have a lot of silver on hand. This they can sell to this country for our merchandise, which we will send across the water for their silver, which they do not want, and we will get something that we do not want and no one else wants and put it in the Treasury, and then we will issue certificates against it. This will not even increase the volume of currency in circulation, because such volume is regulated by supply and demand, and the coming in of this silver currency will simply crowd out a little bit of the Federal Reserve notes that are oustanding.

This is the most futile bill that was ever invented. It is absolutely vicious in that it ties up Federal money in a lot of silver that we do not want and no one in any other country wants, and it will absolutely do no good, and I therefore hope the amendment will be voted down and the bill defeated.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I shall take only a few minutes of the time. This is a simple clarifying amendment offered for the purpose of making certain that the amount of silver shall be held up to the point of 25 percent. There was some doubt as to the language as it appeared in the bill whether that purpose would be accomplished. This amendment is to make certain that that will be done. In other words, if the amount of gold should increase so as to be greater than it is now, silver could be brought up to 25 percent.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do that for the purpose of inquiring in regard to the legal requirements as to the volume of gold. How are you going to regulate the 25 percent if you do not know what the legal requirements now are?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. We know how much gold is in the Treasury.

Mr. McFADDEN. But the amount of gold in the Treasury is a changing proposition. There are no legal requirements now as to how much gold shall at all times remain in the United States Treasury. You have done away with all legal gold requirements.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The question of the gold reserve has nothing to do with this.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does it refer to the gold in the Treasury or the Federal Reserve banks, or are you always to treat the $2,000,000,000 gold-exchange fund as a part of the gold in the Treasury?

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The Federal Reserve banks have no gold.

Mr. McFADDEN. They only have gold certificates, which are not payable in gold unless the Secretary of the Treasury sees fit to pay in gold. I was trying to get it clarified. I have heretofore pointed out what will happen to our gold in the future. I want to refer now to the statement that the gentleman from Tennessee made after I spoke a short time ago. I want to refresh the memory of Members who were here when the Pittman Act was passed in war time.

We had then a great surplus of silver dollars in the United States Treasury. The British had a great interest in getting that silver from us at that time. The silver producers in this country agitated it for a long time. Silver was then selling at $1.36 to $1.39 per ounce. The Pittman Act was passed, and, I say, the British wanted to get the silver to ship to India.

I call attention to the fact that 200,000,000 ounces of silver were sold and sent to Great Britain. Great Britain gave us her I O U. Great Britain took that silver to London, coined it into rupees, and sent it to India, and made $200,000,000 on the transaction, and by this action Great Britain tightened her hold on India.

That shows the British interest in silver. They are as much interested now in silver as they were then. When the Pittman Act was passed, we had in the Treasury over 450,000,000 silver dollars, and the Pittman Act authorized the breaking up of those dollars and authorized the sale of that silver. Great Britain has always controlled the silver market. The Montagues, the Sassoons, and other Jewish bankers have juggled silver markets in India, China, and elsewhere to their own great profit, and always to the benefit of the British Empire.

So it was during the closing days of the World War that England sent Lord Reading (Sir Rufus Isaacs) to Washington to get the two hundred millions of silver in our Treasury, and his boat waited anchored in the Potomac until President Wilson told him that Congress had passed the authority for the sale.

The silver men, or the producers in the country, insisted that inasmuch as this silver was to be sold to the British and other buyers at $1 an ounce, when the price was $1.36 or more, that the amount that was sold abroad should be repurchased from the American silver producers; so that clause was put in the act; and as two-hundred-and-fourteen-and-odd million ounces were sold, 200,000,000 ounces were repurchased from the American silver producers. That explains the great surplus at that time in the Treasury, how it was taken out of the country, how anxious the silver producers were to get rid of it, and how anxious the British were to increase their power and control over India. Then it came to the point where India was demanding her independence from Great Britain, and Great Britain put India back on the gold basis and demonetized silver. Since that time the Indians and the British are interested in getting rid of their surplus stocks of silver. England has again strengthened her hold on India, and through this process is slowly drawing gold out of India and thus weakening India. England's interest in silver is great today.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, this silver bill is going in the right direction. It will help to broaden our monetary base for the proper expansion of our currency. Ever since 1929 I have said on this floor that we would never get out of this panic and restore prosperity to the American people until we expand the currency and put that currency into circulation.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] asked why we did not do something when the Democrats were in power before. I call attention to the fact that we did do something. It was under the democratic administration that the Federal Reserve Act was passed, which gave us an elastic currency and enabled us to expand the currency through the Federal Reserve System. In 1914 we had $34.93 per capita in circulation; wheat was around 50 cents to 60 cents a bushel cotton 10 cents a pound. We began to expand that currency until 1920, when we had $53.21 per capita in circulation, cotton was 30 cents a pound and wheat $2.50 a bushel, and other commodity prices were higher in proportion. While we were on that level we contracted our debts, floated our bonds, and incurred our obligations. When Mr. Ogden Mills became Secretary of the Treasury, they began, under the pressure of Wall Street, to contract that currency until when the panic broke in 1929 they had it back to approximately $35 per capita. That is what brought on our panic, and the way to correct it is to reissue that money and put it into circulation.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman also remembers that in 1878 we passed the Bland Act which was for the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and it went to the Senate and that body limited it to $2,000,000 a month.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to discuss this other phase. Money is the lifeblood of a nation. We do not circulate gold and we do not circulate much silver. We circulate paper currency issued against our gold reserve. This bill adds 25 percent of silver to that reserve, and as I said, broadens the base for the issuance of more currency against it. But if we are going to raise commodity prices, we will have to use the power already written into the law to issue currency against the monetary base we have and put it into circulation. If that is done, if they would do that tomorrow, if they would issue $2,500,000,000 and put it into circulation, you would see the price of wheat and corn and cotton and hogs and land and lumber begin to rise and you would not need the N.R.A., you would not need artificial stimulation.

You would soon have normal conditions. Prices of wheat, cotton, corn, cattle, and so forth, would rise. It would soon bring back prosperity to all the American people. It would bring back the prices of farm commodities to what they were when our debts were contracted; and until that is done, we cannot hope to get out of debt.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] criticized the reduction of the gold content of the dollar. Last year he was for it. I supported the proposition to cut the gold content of the dollar. I shall support this proposition because, as I said, it gives us a broader monetary base. I believe the administration will carry out the policies laid down in these laws, exercise the powers we have given them to issue this currency and put it into circulation and when they do, you will see this panic break, the prices of raw materials rise, and prosperity return. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARSONS: Page 2, line 6, strike out the words "at such times."

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose in offering this amendment is to be sure that the Secretary of the Treasury will purchase what silver is available, at least in the United States. The bill as written reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase silver, at home or abroad, * * * at such rates, at such times, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest.

So long as the three words "at such times" remain in the bill it is discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase it tomorrow; if not, next month; if not, next year; if not, 5 years or 10 years from now; or whenever he may decide.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. For the very reasons assigned by the gentleman, we could not take those three words out.

With those three words stricken out, he might have to buy it all in the morning. He could not do that. He has to buy it as he can. With those three words stricken out, he might be required to buy it all at one time. Of course, he could not do that.

Mr. PARSONS. The three words preceding and the line following those three words give the Secretary of the Treasury discretionary powers to buy at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable; but if we leave in "at such times", that time can be continued until tomorrow or next month or next year or no time whatsoever. But if we eliminate those three words, then he is compelled to go into the market and at least purchase silver, discretionary upon the terms most advantageous to the public interest.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I am sure the gentleman will admit that the very thing he says might happen cannot happen under the policy laid down in this bill unless there is an absolute breach of faith, and I know he does not think for a moment such a thing could happen.

Mr. PARSONS. Of course, the hearings contain many statements as to what this bill proposes to do. The gentlemen of the committee know what a task we have had on this silver question beginning with last year, and especially during the last 3 or 4 months, and it was only a few days ago that any concession was made whatsoever on the silver question by the President, by the administration, with reference to taking silver into the monetary scheme. Therefore I submit to the committee that if those three words are stricken out, the Secretary of the Treasury will be bound to go into the markets, at least into the domestic markets, to buy the silver that is available; and under the terms of this act, he cannot put it off until next year or the next year after that; and I also submit that if the three words "at such times" remain in the bill, the Secretary of the Treasury does not have to purchase one single dime's worth of silver, either domestic or foreign, this year or next year, if he decided in his own discretionary mind that it is not in the public interest.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we all recognize that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS] who has just addressed us has done valiant service in the cause of silver in this and preceding Congress, but I submit to you that the striking out of the words "at such times" will not remove the objection which the gentleman from Illinois sees in the section. The three words immediately preceding the language he seeks to strike out, empowering the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver at such rates as he may see fit, would give him the same discretion of dilatory tactics were to be pursued as the power included in the words "at such times."

I submit to the Committee that in my judgment the reason why the words "at such times" should be included here is to prevent the Treasury's having to pay more for the silver than the real market price. There has been some criticism heard in the consideration of this bill with regard to speculators. This language is protective against any corner in silver. It protects against the opportunity for increased profits. Now, if you say in this bill that you must buy all this silver at one time, I submit to you there would be an artificial price. It would be a much-increased price. It would not be a lasting stimulus to the commodity prices in this country or throughout the world, because, after this quantity of silver is purchased at one time, I fear that the price would immediately drop and the benefits hereunder materially decreased.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman knows the Secretary of the Treasury will not have to buy all this silver in bulk, because " at such rates, at such times, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem " reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest gives him discretionary power still; but if you keep " at such times " in the bill, then he does not have to purchase a single dime's worth this year or next year or the year after that, and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I beg to differ with the gentleman. This discretionary power is a protective weapon in the hand of the Secretary of the Treasury. It protects the Treasury of the United States and thereby the people of the United States. The section of the bill which provides for the purchase of the 1,300,000,000 ounces of silver necessary to make the one-quarter ratio of silver to the monetary stocks is a mandatory provision. The members of the committee must recognize that it is a mandatory provision, and we cannot for a split second think that the Secretary of the Treasury is going to disregard such mandatory order—the direct mandate of the Congress of the United States. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this language as drafted, with those words in it, is for the protection of the Treasury and the people of the United States. I ask that the amendment be voted down.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. FIESINGER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

Mr. MOTT. I have an amendment. The gentleman from Illinois talked out of his turn. I ought to have a right to discuss my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FIESINGER: Page 2, line 9, after the word " hereunder ", strike out " at a price in excess of the monetary value thereof " and insert in lieu thereof the following: "After the purchasing power of a grain of gold shall be above that purchasing power which it had as of January 1, 1926, under the wholesale commodity-price index as computed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics."

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There is nothing in the bill with regard to a 1926 commodity index price.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, further supporting the point of order, the bill relates entirely to price. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio relates entirely to time. Thus the subject matters are entirely different.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOTT: Page 2, line 3, after the word " silver ", strike out the remainder of section 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following: " newly mined in the United States at such rates and at such times as he may deem reasonable and the most advantageous to the public interest: Provided, That no purchase of silver shall be made at a price in excess of the market value thereof, and in no event at a price in excess of 50 cents per fine ounce. Said silver shall be paid for by silver certificates to be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury for that purpose and not otherwise."

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be read before the vote is taken on the first amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman willing to have the second amendment considered in conjunction with the first one? It may save time to do it this way.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I had offered an amendment and had been recognized by the Chair, but the gentleman from Illinois was recognized on an amendment he offered, and then the chairman of the committee moved that debate on the section be closed. That is the reason I offered the second amendment. I wish to be heard on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOTT: I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to talk on the motion last read, but I wish to be heard on the amendment I have offered.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order unless he confines his remarks to the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon must confine himself to the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman has taken up a lot of time in making points of no quorum in an endeavor to delay consideration of the bill. I think the gentleman ought to confine himself to the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. MOTT. I was perfectly frank in stating the reason why I offered the motion to strike out the enacting clause. I felt that I should have been given an opportunity to talk on my amendment, because the gentleman from Illinois was recognized after I had been recognized and after my amendment had already been sent to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, this bill is not going to give to the silver-producing States the relief they suppose it will afford. The measure, in my opinion, is offered as a mere sop to the silver-producing States, and I think they are going to experience the greatest disillusionment and the rudest awakening imaginaable when this bill is actually put into operation.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield.

Mr. MAY. May not the fact that this bill provides in the latter part of section 3 that the price of silver shall not exceed 50 cents per fine ounce when situated in the United States result in the purchase of foreign silver at a price far in excess of 50 cents a fine ounce and in this way militate against the interests of the domestic silver producer?

Mr. MOTT. I think so; and my amendment prohibits the purchase of silver outside of the United States. Not only that, but it limits the silver which may be purchased to newly mined silver. That is the only kind of silver purchasing that can do the silver States any possible good.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Oregon is not speaking to his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon will confine himself to the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. MOTT. That, Mr. Chairman, is precisely what I am doing. The reasons I am advancing are reasons why the enacting clause should be stricken out. Most certainly I am addressing myself to my motion. If the purchase of silver is not to be confined to the United States, this bill ought not to be passed, and that is sufficient reason why the enacting clause should be stricken out. And because the bill does not, in its present form, restrict silver purchases to newly mined silver in the United States, I am now contending that the enacting clause should be stricken out.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not speaking to the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. MOTT. The reasons I assign for striking out the enacting clause are applicable both to the motion and to the amendment, that is true; but in view of what I have just said, I hardly see how the gentleman can contend that I am not speaking to the motion.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman is addressing himself to a nondebatable amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will discuss his motion.

Mr. MOTT. That certainly is what I am doing. If gentlemen would kindly refrain from interrupting me until I get fairly into the discussion, they would see at once that the discussion is on the motion. Now, Mr. Chairman, if it is assumed that newly mined silver——

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Oregon is not speaking to his motion to strike out the enacting clause, but is addressing himself to his amendment, when all debate on the section has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon may not discuss his amendment because debate on the section has been closed. The gentleman may discuss his motion to strike the enacting clause from the bill.

Mr. TABER. Anything pertaining to striking out the enacting clause is pertinent.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Then everything I have said is pertinent. The enacting clause should be stricken in order that we may have a bill reported providing for such legislation as I am advocating. What kind of legislation is that? It is the legislation proposed in the amendment I have offered. Strike out the enacting clause and then bring in a bill providing for the purchase of silver—silver newly mined in the United States—and you will have the relief which the silver States want but which this bill does not give them.

This bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may buy silver wherever he pleases, whenever he pleases, and that he shall pay for it any price that he pleases, until he has purchased enough to equal in monetary value one-fourth of the value of the gold stocks in the Treasury. He is not obliged to buy any of it in the United States. He can buy it all from India or China, if he wants to.

Let me ask gentlemen from the silver-producing States how such a measure is going to help them? How is it going to help our mining industry? Literally thousands of speculators in silver who have been purchasing that metal at cheap prices in contemplation of this legislation are going to be taken care of. They are the people behind this bill. They are the ones who are going to benefit by it. When the Treasury gets through buying the billion or more ounces which these speculators have cornered, and when it gets through buying another billion which will be dumped here by foreign countries who want our gold for it, where, I ask you, are our silver mines going to receive any benefit?

What does this Government owe to foreign nations that it should buy their silver for gold at the market price while our own silver mines are shut down for want of either a domestic or a foreign market for their product? What do we owe to the speculators who have bought up the domestic supply of silver, when there was no market for it, at prices below which it can be produced, and who now under this bill may exchange it for gold and Government bonds at prices from 25 to 50 percent in excess of what they paid for it?

I am not sure whether any amendment can make this bill a good one. But if you must buy silver until the stocks of that metal equal 25 percent of the gold in the Treasury, then why not confine your purchases to silver newly mined in the United States instead of buying it from foreigners and gamblers? That will at least help our mining industry. It will put thousands of unemployed men to work. This bill in its present form will help nobody to whom the United States owes any obligation whatever.

This bill started with good intentions. I think the intentions upon the part of the original sponsors of the bill were good, but it has been turned into one of the worst pieces of financial racketeering that I have ever heard of. The provision in this bill to buy at the monetary price all of the silver that has been hoarded through the years by financial speculators throughout the country, in my opinion, is a most vicious thing. The honest sponsors of this legislation never intended that this racket should be injected into the bill, and they should assert themselves now, before it is too late, and demand that this racketeering be stricken out of the bill.

I should like the gentlemen from the silver States to consider this. I want to help the silver States, but if this bill passes in its present form, obviously the only people in the United States who will benefit to any appreciable extent will be the speculators and hoarders—and the foreign countries who have for years been endeavoring to exchange their silver for our gold.

There is another change that should be made in the bill. As it is drawn it provides that the silver purchased shall be paid for in gold, currency, bonds, and other securities which are backed by the gold reserve in our Treasury. What is the reason for this? Purchase by such means will cost the Government nearly a billion dollars.

If additional silver is to be purchased, it should be paid for with silver certificates issued for that purpose in the amount of the silver purchased. That would cost the Government nothing, because it would then be simply a matter of taking the silver from the owner, depositing it in the Treasury, and issuing therefor silver certificates backed by the very silver purchased.

At the conclusion of this debate I intend to offer a motion to recommit and to instruct the committee to report out the bill with the amendment I have offered, providing that purchases of silver under this bill shall be confined to silver newly mined in the United States and that it shall be purchased with silver certificates. If the silver States are sincere in their desire to help their mining industry, to take the racketeering out of this measure, and to enable the Government to increase its silver reserve without bankrupting itself, I hope they will support the motion. [Applause.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the motion of the gentleman from Oregon to strike out the enacting clause do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky and Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri objected.

The motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McGUGIN) there were—ayes 21, noes 88.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. DOUGHTON and Mr. MOTT to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 22, noes 89.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. Whenever and so long as the market price of silver exceeds its monetary value or the monetary value of the stocks of silver is greater than 25 percent of the monetary value of the stocks of gold and silver, the Secretary of the Treasury may, with the approval of the President and subject to the provisions of section 5, sell any silver acquired under the authority of this act, at home or abroad, for present or future delivery, at such rates, at such times, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem reasonable and most advantageous to the public interest.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURDOCK: Page 2, line 18, after the word "value", strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and."

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, if there is anything in this bill that makes it worthy of being called a silver bill it is the fact that it has the mandatory clause providing that one-fourth of our metal monetary stocks shall be acquired and maintained in silver, and every speech that has been made by members of the committee on the floor of the House today has been to the effect that, if there is anything mandatory in the bill, that clause is mandatory which provides that we must maintain one-fourth of the metal monetary stocks in silver. If there is a joker in the bill, or if there is anything in the bill that destroys that mandatory clause, it is the conjunction "or" in line 18 of section 4.

We have as one of the protections to the Treasury the provision that they cannot buy silver after it rises above its monetary value. In my opinion, that is a sufficient protection; but, if you allow the disjunctive word "or" to stand instead of replacing that word with the conjunctive "and", then immediately when the price of silver goes to $1.29 the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell silver, thereby wholly destroying the mandatory feature.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Does the gentleman not believe if the price of silver should reach $1.29 and go above $1.29 that that would have a depressing effect on commodity values, and would the gentleman not be satisfied with that price for silver?

Mr. MURDOCK. I am satisfied that the limit on the price to be paid of $1.29 an ounce is all that the Government needs, and therefore if the members of the committee want to be consistent, how can the Treasury be directed to maintain the metal monetary stocks of this country at one-fourth silver and at the same time be directed whenever the price goes above $1.29 to sell the silver stocks regardless of whether there is more than one-fourth silver in the Treasury or not?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Does the gentleman not believe it would be in the interest of the economic condition of the country to reduce the premium value of the silver if it should go above $1.29 an ounce?

Mr. MURDOCK. May I ask the gentleman a question? He has made a speech on the floor, and every member of the committee has made a speech on the floor, telling the people of the country that it is absolutely mandatory to maintain one-fourth of our metal-money stocks in silver. Then we find this joker in the bill: The Secretary of the Treasury may, immediately on the price rising above $1.29, regardless of the quantity of silver in the Treasury, sell it. You either mean it is mandatory or it is not mandatory. If you mean what you have been saying all day here in the House, then you cannot consistently object to my amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. The gentleman does not advocate here that the Secretary of the Treasury should continue to pay more for the silver than it is worth in money?

Mr. MURDOCK. Absolutely not. That is just what I am trying to put over. You are protected there, and you cannot purchase after it reaches $1.29; but why permit the Secretary of the Treasury by this section to sell silver even though you have not in the Treasury one-fourth of your metal monetary stock in silver? If the gentleman can answer that question, I wish he would.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If the sales of silver should bring the price down below $1.29, the Government would stop selling.

Mr. MURDOCK. I am not interested in bringing the price down. What I want is to boost the price. If the President meant anything in his message, and if the gentlemen meant anything in their talks on the floor, they mean we are going to keep the silver until we have one-fourth of monetary stocks in silver; and consistency demands that your committee accept my amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to one feature of the general debate this afternoon where for a brief period we touched on the industrial use of silver.

On page 56 of the hearing, Mr. MCCORMACK interrogated Mr. Oliphant as follows:

I should like to know why, Mr. Oliphant, a 50-percent tax should be imposed upon silver used in legitimate business, on the profits.

Mr. OLIPHANT. I think that is a very legitimate question. Why should we impose a tax upon the middleman who merely buys silver, we will say, from a producer and sells the silver to a manufacturer?

The difficulty there is the difficulty I know your committee has so frequently run into, and that is the problem of classification.

Then, later on, Mr. Oliphant said:

I am prepared to say this, if I may: If we can work out a feasible classification, and by that I mean a classification between speculative dealing and ordinary trade dealing, that is feasible from the standpoint of administration, I would be very happy to go along with it.

Now, whether or not any such provision has been worked out, I think, is a pending question that the majority members of the committee ought to be prepared to answer.

The only expert I heard was our colleague from Texas [Mr. DIES], who said that the Government's buying up silver would, of course, increase the price of silver by increasing the demand in the market. Therefore, there will be a marked increase in the price of silver to the industrial or commercial user of it, and I think the inquiry which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] made of Mr. Oliphant ought to be answered as to whether or not a classification can be offered under which industrial silver will not be increased in price because the Government is going to buy up silver and hoard it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] referred to the tax on silver used commercially and Mr. Oliphant stated, and it is perfectly clear, that the user of silver commercially does not pay the tax.

Mr. TREADWAY. If that is true, that helps partially.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. And it is also true, according to the evidence before our committee, that in the ordinary course of business—and nothing is done here to disturb this procedure—users of commercial silver get it from the mine. The definition of "cost" in this bill states specifically that the market price of silver for the silver-mine owners is the cost of production. Consequently, I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, there is no tax upon newly mined silver that is sold to commercial users, because there is no difference between the cost price to the mine owner as defined in the bill and the price at which he sells it—that is assuming that the mining company sells, in ordinary course of business, without holding silver for speculative purposes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes, because I think this is a question we ought to consider.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I just want to remind the gentleman that the question he is discussing comes up in connection with page 7 of the bill, while we are now on page 2.

Mr. TREADWAY. But it is a question having to do with the bill very definitely, and while the explanation of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] may take care of the feature to which he is referring, namely, that there will be no tax on this industrial silver, nevertheless, if the Government creates a fictitious value for the marketable silver in the markets of the world, London and New York, how can the industrial user of silver buy at any other than this fictitious value or price?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I have never heard anyone suggest that the user of commercial silver should buy below the market price.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then, if the purchases—by the Government—raise the price of silver, the industrial user of silver will be at a very marked disadvantage. May I ask the gentleman if he agrees with this statement?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I will say that the user of commercial silver will pay the market price.

Mr. TREADWAY. And he will be at a disadvantage if the Government raises the market price.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. He will pay more for it than he would if the price had not been increased.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman then recognizes the fact that this bill will inflict a hardship on the user of commercial silver.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It will increase the price of silver.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is what I wanted the gentleman to say.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. As I understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], the gentleman stated that the tax did not apply if the silver was bought at the mines, if it is all commercial; otherwise, then, the tax does apply. Is that what I understand?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The tax is paid by the transferor, and if the transferor bought it for a less price and sold it at a profit, he must pay the tax. Certainly a person using commercial silver is not going to pay a higher price to a transferor when he can buy it more cheaply from the mine, which does not have to pay tax if sale is in ordinary course of business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do it for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that this is Decoration Day, a day when the entire country is paying honor to those who have served their country and paid their last sad sacrifice. Yet the House of Representatives seems to pay no attention to it. Here it is a quarter past 6, and the House does not seem to be willing to pay that same respect to one of its own Members who has passed away. I think it is time for the House to adjourn.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that even though this be Decoration Day, we are serving our country here as best we can. The Senate is also in session considering legislation. I stated to the House, and it was well understood, that we could get through with this bill, and if it had not been for the time taken up in a filibuster carried on on the gentleman's side of the Chamber, we would have been through by now.

Mr. DARROW. Oh, no.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not say that the gentleman filibustered, but I do say that one gentleman on his side made two or three points of no quorum when there was a quorum present. Then he called for tellers when the vote was overwhelmingly in favor of the amendment.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. We cannot accept a challenge like that. If gentlemen will go ahead and discuss legitimate amendments, we can get through with this bill in a very short time; but we cannot do it when gentlemen undertake to filibuster, as some gentlemen have undertaken to do.

Mr. DARROW. If I am correctly informed, the first roll call today was caused by a Member on the gentleman's side; not on this side of the House at all.

Mr. BYRNS. That may be true; but there has been a plain intent to filibuster, and the gentleman himself stood up a moment ago and called for tellers on an amendment that was overwhelmingly adopted.

Mr. DARROW. I thought that was proper.

Mr. McGUGIN. And when did it become a filibuster to ask for tellers?

Mr. BYRNS. It is a filibuster when on a vote that is 3 to 1 someone calls for tellers, when everybody knows that tellers are called for for the purpose of delay. There is a chance to adjourn this House sine die next Saturday week, if we pass this bill; and there is no chance to do it unless we stay here and attend to business. That is the only motive that I have in this matter. I do not have to go home any more than anybody else, but I know the country wants this House to adjourn, and I know the only way we can adjourn is to pass legislation that is deemed necessary.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the gentleman think these two or three teller votes are responsible for this desecration of Decoration Day?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I wonder if the House knows that one of the Pennsylvania delegation died yesterday afternoon, and that the Pennsylvania Members want to pass a resolution out of respect to that Member.

Mr. BYRNS. That will be done; but I have seen the House on many occasions insist on doing business before such a resolution is passed, and I wonder if the gentleman from Pennsylvania knew that our deceased colleague was dead, when he was joining in the filibuster on that side.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue silver certificates in such denominations as he may from time to time prescribe in a face amount not less than the cost of all silver purchased under the authority of section 3. There shall be maintained in the Treasury as security for all silver certificates heretofore or hereafter issued and at the time outstanding an amount of silver in bullion and standard silver dollars of a monetary value equal to the face amount of such silver certificates. All silver certificates heretofore or hereafter issued shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues, and shall be redeemable on demand at the Treasury of the United States in standard silver dollars; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to coin standard silver dollars for such redemption.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FIESINGER: Page 3, line 3, strike out the entire section 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue silver certificates redeemable upon demand in silver bullion to the full value of the face of the certificate in such denominations as he may from time to time prescribe in an aggregate amount of not less than the cost of all silver purchased under the authority of section 8. There shall be maintained in the Treasury for the redemption of all silver certificates issued under this act an amount of silver in bullion equal in value to the face amount of such silver certificates. Also silver certificates heretofore or hereafter issued shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties and dues."

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would make silver primary money and legal tender, at its world-accepted value. That is to say, the Secretary of the Treasury would take this one-fourth of silver reserve, as provided for in this act, and give it circulation at its true value without artificial support or restraint. He would issue certificates against the silver bullion so purchased to the full amount he paid for it. There would be no profit and no loss.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. If silver is purchased abroad, how is the Treasury to pay for it? In gold?

Mr. FIESINGER. It can be settled for in those countries abroad that will take these certificates, as provided in the bill, in lawful money of the United States.

Mr. McFADDEN. "Lawful money" means gold, in settlement of international transactions, does it not?

Mr. FIESINGER. Well, it is provided that the Secretary of the Treasury may use his discretion as to payment. But under the amendment I propose, where silver is a real reserve of primary money, it would be possible and even safe to let some gold go.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the gentleman not see the possibility of a redistribution of a lot of our gold to foreign countries, and our taking silver in return for it?

Mr. FIESINGER. I think we will have to redistribute the gold of this country. Gold must circulate. That is one of the things I want to call to the attention of the committee. There has been a lot said today about having this gold in the Treasury. This bill, in my judgment, contravenes all monetary history in the United States, in that, in my judgment, this bill is going to prevent gold redemption.

A great deal has been said today about Professor Kemmerer, and I do not agree with Professor Kemmerer, but I will say that he is right, and all economists, orthodox and otherwise, who know anything about this subject are right when they tell you that you must have a free market for your basic money and that if you are ever going to have prosperity you must get back to gold redemption. Gold and silver must be freely distributed and must freely circulate throughout the world if they are to serve as money. This is necessary for us if we are ever to have world distribution of commodities, wheat, corn, and hogs and cotton.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. As I understood the gentleman's amendment, it provides for the redemption of these certificates in bullion rather than in silver dollars?

Mr. FIESINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. That has never been done in the history of the country.

Mr. FIESINGER. It has been done in other countries, and we can do it as well as they if we wish to. In our history our silver money has not been a success, and I am pointing out to you the reason why it has not been a success.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Redemption has always been in silver dollars and not in bullion.

Mr. FIESINGER. And they have been 60-cent dollars and they are kept at parity with gold by our law and not by the value in the silver. In fact, there is literature that we have built up in this Congress and in the preceding Congress with two and a half years of study about this subject that seems has never been read.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIESINGER. I cannot yield now.

That literature I do not believe has been read by 10 Members of this House. The whole subject of money has been gone into in that committee. I have been one of the members of that committee and have studied and read that literature, and every man should read that literature which has come out of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures before he is competent to vote upon this bill. And I want to say again that I do not understand why the bill now before the House should not have been referred to that committee, which properly has jurisdiction on this subject.

There is one thing more I want to say. My friend the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN] made the statement that the bill which I introduced would cause three or four times as much profit in speculation as this bill. You will never pass any bill that will eliminate the profit to speculators. Is your design to stop profits speculators, or is it to deal with the fundamental proposition which you are attempting to deal with, that is, to remove the cause and cure this depression? I am aiming to cure the depression. There are people in my district who are starving that they may buy milk for their babies. I have letters telling me this. My heart is sick at the tragedy of it all. I am aiming to stop it, and I see how it can be stopped. I see a way to relieve these people, and I see a way to save this great Nation. I am fearful of the consequences of further delay. Speculator's profits lie everywhere. They did not stop the gold bill nor the wheat bill nor the cotton bill. I am aiming to cure unemployment, strikes, social unrest, and give our people food, clothing, and shelter.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, apparently the sole purpose of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER] is to strike out the very heart of this legislation. Any legislation that does not conform to his views will meet his opposition. I hope that those of you who are in favor of carrying out the views of the administration will vote against his amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Whenever in his judgment such action is necessary to effectuate the policy of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, with the approval of the President, to investigate, regulate, or prohibit, by means of licenses or otherwise, the acquisition, importation, exportation, or transportation of silver and of contracts and other arrangements made with respect thereto; and to require the filing of reports deemed by him reasonably necessary in connection therewith. Whoever willfully violates the provisions of any license, order, rule, or regulation issued pursuant to the authorization contained in this section shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000 or, if a natural person, may be imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both; and any officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation may be punished by a like fine, imprisonment, or both.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE: Page 3, line 17, after the word "redemption", strike out all of section 6.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, if there is anything intended by the enactment of this legislation, it is to increase the purchasing power of silver and to increase the purchasing power of the silver-using countries.

This section 6 provides:

Whenever in his judgment such action is necessary to effectuate the policy of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, with the approval of the President, to investigate, regulate, or prohibit, by means of license or otherwise, the acquisition, importation, exportation, or transportation of silver and of contracts—

And so forth.

That will operate to bar an increase in the value of silver and an increase in the purchasing power of our foreign customers. I want to point out to you that as a result of revaluing the gold dollar, by increasing the value of the ounce of gold from $20.67 to $35 an ounce, we have favored the producers of gold in Great Britain to the tune of $235,000,000 annually. We have raised the purchasing power of our trade competitors in this country by legislative action $235,000,000 annually. When we are producing most of the silver mined in this country we are by this bill placing in the hands of one man the power to control the price of that commodity and we will destroy the main object that it was intended to accomplish in this bill. I ask you to vote out that section. There is no need of it. There is nothing in this bill that requires that section. It is simply a joker put in there to emasculate the legislation which we are trying to enact. I ask you to vote for the amendment.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. Whenever in the judgment of the President such action is necessary to regulate the value of the money of the United States, he may by Executive order require the delivery to the United States mints of any or all silver by whomever owned or possessed. The silver so delivered shall be coined into standard silver dollars or otherwise added to the monetary stocks of the United States as the President may determine; and there shall be returned therefor in standard silver dollars, or any other coin or currency of the United States, the monetary value of the silver so delivered less such deductions for seigniorage, brassage, coinage, and other mint charges as the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President shall have determined: Provided, That in no case shall the value of the amount returned therefor be less than the fair value at the time of such order of the silver required to be delivered at such value is determined by the market price over a reasonable period terminating at the time of such order. The Secretary of the Treasury shall pay all necessary costs of the transportation of such silver and standard silver dollars, coin, or currency, including the cost of insurance, protection, and such other incidental costs as may be reasonably necessary. Any silver withheld in violation of any Executive order issued under this section or of any regulations issued pursuant thereto shall be forfeited to the United States and may be seized and condemned by like proceedings as those provided by law for the forfeiture, seizure, and condemnation of property imported into the United States contrary to law; and, in addition, any person failing to comply with the provisions of any such Executive order or regulation shall be subject to a penalty equal to twice the monetary value of the silver in respect of which such failure occurred.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 4, line 11, strike out the words "regulate the value of the money of the United States" and insert the words "effectuate the policy of this act."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to keep the RECORD straight.

In his closing remarks the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAMNECK] made the unequivocal statement that silver could be taken under the power of eminent domain contained in section 7 at any price that the Secretary of the Treasury might deem fit to pay. In fact, the gentleman said it could be taken by the Secretary for 10 cents an ounce. As a matter of fact, newly mined silver in this country now is selling at 64½ cents an ounce. The world price for silver is 45 cents an ounce.

I want to call to the attention of the committee the provision of the bill in regard to the price that must be paid for silver that is taken under this power of eminent domain under section 1. You find the language of the bill in this section, which reads:

Provided, That in no case shall the value of the amount returned therefor be less than the fair value at the time of such order of the silver required to be delivered as such value is determined by the market price over a reasonable period terminating at the time of such order.

I think that is perfectly clear. The fair market value is to be received for the silver taken—without any tax thereon. I have already stated here, but I wish again to repeat it, that if the owner of the silver so taken under this power of eminent domain is not satisfied with the price that the Secretary of the Treasury fixes according to the market price over a reasonable period of time terminating at the time of the order, the claimant has the right under the general law of the land to go into the Court of Claims, and there the market value of the silver will be determined. The exercise of the power of eminent domain carries with it just compensation for the property taken. No property shall be taken even by our Government without just compensation. The holders of silver are protected by this constitutional right, and general law provides jurisdiction in the United States Court of Claims for the determination of such rights.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. Schedule A of title VIII of the Revenue Act of 1926, as amended (relating to stamp taxes), is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"10. Silver, and so forth, sales and transfers.—On all transfers of any interest in silver bullion, if the price for which such interest is or is to be transferred exceeds the total of the cost thereof and allowed expenses, 50 percent of the amount of such excess. On every such transfer there shall be made and delivered by the transferor to the transferee a memorandum to which there shall be affixed lawful stamps in value equal to the tax thereon. Every such memorandum shall show the date thereof, the names and addresses of the transferor and transferee, the interest in silver bullion to which it refers, the price for which such interest is or is to be transferred and the cost thereof and the allowed expenses. Any person liable for payment of tax under this subdivision (or anyone who acts in the matter as agent or broker for any such person) who is a party to any such transfer, or who in pursuance of any such transfer delivers any silver bullion or interest therein, without a memorandum stating truly and completely the information herein required, or who delivers any such memorandum without having the proper stamps affixed thereto, with intent to evade the foregoing provisions, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $1,000 or be imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both. Stamps affixed under this subdivision shall be canceled (in lieu of the manner provided in section 804) by such officers and in such manner as regulations under this subdivision shall prescribe. Such officers shall cancel such stamps only if it appears that the proper tax is being paid, and when stamps with respect to any transfer are so canceled, the transferor and not the transferee shall be liable for any additional tax found due or penalty with respect to such transfer. The provisions of this subdivision shall extend to all transfers in the United States of any interest in silver bullion, and to all such transfers outside the United States if either party thereto is a resident of the United States or is a citizen of the United States who has been a resident thereof within 3 months before the date of the transfer or if such silver bullion or interest therein is situated in the United States; and shall extend to transfers to the United States Government (the tax in such cases to be payable by the transferor), but shall not extend to transfers of silver bullion by deposit or delivery at a United States mint under proclamation by the President or in compliance with any Executive order issued pursuant to section 7 of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934. The tax under this subdivision on transfers enumerated in subdivision 4 shall be in addition to the tax under such subdivision. This subdivision shall apply (1) with respect to all transfers of any interest in silver bullion after the enactment of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, and (2) with respect to all transfers of any interest in silver bullion on or after May 15, 1934, and prior to the enactment of the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, except that in such cases it shall be paid by the transferor in such manner and at such time as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulations prescribe, and the requirement of a memorandum of such transfer shall not apply.

"As used in this subdivision—

"The term 'cost' means the cost of the interest in silver bullion to the transferor, except that (a) in case of silver bullion produced from materials containing silver which has not previously entered into industrial, commercial, or monetary use, the cost to a transferor who is the producer shall be deemed to be the market price at the time of production determined in accordance with regulations issued hereunder; (b) in the case of an interest in silver bullion acquired by the transferor otherwise than for valuable consideration, the cost shall be deemed to be the cost thereof to the last previous transferor by whom it was acquired for a valuable consideration; and (c) in the case of any interest in silver bullion acquired by the transferor (after Apr. 15, 1934, and before the tax under this subdivision takes effect) in a wash sale, the cost shall be deemed to be the cost to him of the interest transferred by him in such wash sale, but with proper adjustment, in accordance with regulations under this subdivision, when such interests are in silver bullion for delivery at different times.

"The term 'transfer' means a sale, agreement of sale, agreement to sell, memorandum of sale or delivery of, or transfer, whether made by assignment in blank or by any delivery, or by any paper or agreement or memorandum or any other evidence of transfer or sale; or means to make a transfer as so defined.

"The term 'interest in silver bullion' means any title or claim to, or interest in, any silver bullion or contract therefor.

"The term 'allowed expenses' means usual and necessary expenses actually incurred in holding, refining, or transporting the interest in silver bullion as to which an interest is transferred (including storage, insurance, and transportation charges but not including interest, taxes, or charges in the nature of overhead), determined in accordance with regulations issued hereunder.

"The term 'memorandum' means a bill, memorandum, agreement, or other evidence of a transfer.

"The term 'wash sale' means a transaction involving the transfer of an interest in silver bullion and, within 30 days before or after such transfer, the acquisition by the same person of an interest in silver bullion. Only so much of the interest so acquired as does not exceed the interest so transferred, and only so much of the interest so transferred as does not exceed the interest so acquired, shall be deemed to be included in the wash sale.

"The term 'silver bullion' means silver which has been melted, smelted, or refined and is in such state or condition that its value depends primarily upon the silver content and not upon its form."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 9, line 11, strike out the word "refining" and insert the word "processing."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 6, line 1, strike out "50" and insert in lieu thereof "90."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered, as I stated in general debate, for the purpose of making the situation of the holder of and speculator in silver analogous to that of the holder of or speculator in gold. The speculator in gold was required to turn his gold in to the Treasury of this country without any profit whatever. Under this bill the holder of and speculator in silver is entitled to 50 percent of the profit that might be made by his speculation.

Speculation in silver has been on a colossal scale by a large number of speculators who have no interest in silver other than an interest to gamble. The bill as it stands without confiscatory language is a racket—a racket for the benefit of the gambler and the speculator. This amendment is offered to take the racket out of the bill. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Is there any reason why the American people should be prohibited from gambling in gold but permitted to gamble in silver?

Mr. TABER. Not a particle. That is why it is a racket, and why the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I covered this question during the course of my remarks on the bill. As I stated then, the effect of such an amendment as that proposed by the gentleman from New York would be the closing of the silver market in this country. We now have 2 outstanding silver markets, 1 in New York and 1 in London; and the effect of such an amendment as this would be to close the market in this country and leave us at the mercy of the London market in carrying out the program contemplated under this bill. The amendment should be voted down.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 10, noes 102.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a motion to strike out the enacting clause which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CULKIN: I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, In the first place, there has been no change in this bill, as I remember, since the committee voted down a previous motion to strike out the enacting clause. In the second place, the motion to strike out the enacting clause must be in writing; and, in the third place, the gentleman must declare himself opposed to the bill.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, there have been two amendments adopted since the previous motion and this motion is in writing.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CULKIN. I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. BYRNS. The motion shall be in writing.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in writing.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen in charge of this bill saw fit to cut off discussion on an amendment which exempted industrial silver from the application of this law. The reason I am making this motion is to protect my rights as a Member of the House and to protect the rights of my constituents as far as possible. Mr. Chairman, I have pending at the desk an amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the debate must be confined to the motion to strike out the enacting clause and not to any amendment which the gentleman may wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I am doing the best I can. Section 8 of this law provides a penalty for speculation. The statute brands the manufacturer as a speculator.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Will the gentleman point out the language in the bill that brands the manufacturer as a speculator?

Mr. CULKIN. You brand him as a speculator when you put a tax on silver that is used in industry.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If the gentleman will yield further, there is no tax levied on silver in a manufacturing process. There is no tax levied on a manufacturer who holds stocks of silver for manufacturing uses. There is no tax levied on fabricated silver commodities.

Mr. CULKIN. The monetary bill specifically exempted gold, and I have been endeavoring for the last hour to get the gentlemen of the committee to consent that this bill exoept the silver used in manufacturing.

May I say further, Mr. Chairman, that one-sixth of the 39,000,000 ounces, the total silver produced in continental America, is used in these manufacturing establishments, such as for jewelry and other types of manufactures. The silver industry employs 100,000 men, and it is now proposed to put an additional burden on them and that, if you please, without any chance for discussion here, simply an arbitrary, unjustified procedure on the part of this committee.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. With the Secretary of the Treasury empowered under this bill to buy 1,312,000,000 ounces of silver, what does the gentleman think is the leading factor in determining the market value of silver? Is it not the fact that the Federal Government is in the market for silver?

Mr. CULKIN. Certainly.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. This being true, will that not fix the market value to the manufacturer who has to buy for industrial use?

Mr. CULKIN. That is true to some extent. But I may say to the gentleman that there is a border line there. There is a danger that the so-called "bureaucrats"—perhaps that is an impolite term—of the Treasury will say to the industrialists: "You must pay a tax." The gentleman has heard of that sort of thing before. Why not clarify the language? Why not give it a reasonable clarification by an amendment exempting silver used for industrial purposes? I may say to the gentleman that that was done in the gold bill.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. If the manufacturer has to buy his silver in the market, and if that market is fixed by the fact the Federal Government is buying silver, what benefit will there be to the manufacturer to let the transferor to him of the silver have a tax rebate on his stocks? He will have to pay the same amount of money anyway.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. As used in this act—

The term "person" means an individual, partnership, association, or corporation;

The term "the continental United States" means the States of the United States, the District of Columbia, and the Territory of Alaska;

The term "monetary value" means a value calculated on the basis of $1 for an amount of silver or gold equal to the amount at the time contained in the standard silver dollar and the gold dollar, respectively;

The term "stocks of silver" means the total amount of silver at the time owned by the United States (whether or not held as security for outstanding currency of the United States) and of silver contained in coins of the United States at the time outstanding;

The term "stocks of gold" means the total amount of gold at the time owned by the United States, whether or not held as a reserve or as security for any outstanding currency of the United States; and

The term "silver bullion" means silver which has been melted, smelted, or refined and is in such state or condition that its value depends primarily upon the silver content and not upon its form.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 11, strike out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, in line 6, page 11, I think there is an oversight in the matter of the committee amendment in not including the semicolon and the word "and" as a part of the matter to be stricken out. I therefore offer an amendment striking out the semicolon and the word "and" and inserting a period.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL: Page 11, line 6, after the word "States", strike out the semicolon and the word "and" and insert a period.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. In addition to any sums appropriated by section 3 there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, which shall be available for expenditure under the direction of the President and in his discretion, for any purpose in connection with the carrying out of this act; and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated annually such additional sums as may be necessary for such purposes.

Page 11, line 11, after the figure "11", strike out the words "In addition to any sums appropriated by section 3 there is hereby" and insert in lieu thereof the words "There is authorized to be".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MARTIN of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 9745) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 401, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in the Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on amendments? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I understand if the House adjourns now, this will be the first order of business in the morning after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Yes. The Chair would suggest that we proceed with the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, it is the understanding that the vote on the passage of the bill will go over until tomorrow morning.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—H.R. 9715

Mr. STUDLEY. Mr. Speaker, we are again facing the same problem that was faced by the Cleveland administration in 1893. We are about to dash ourselves to pieces against the economic laws that we cannot repeal.

The heresy of trying to advance the price of silver by an act of Congress has again arisen. This heresy was slain by our people in 1896. But it has again been brought to life.

Let us turn back the pages of our recent history.

Within the memory of many of us now in the Congress the Silver Purchase Act of July 14, 1890, was enacted. This act provided in substance that the Government must purchase monthly 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion, and that the Secretary of the Treasury should issue in payment therefor Treasury notes redeemable on demand in gold or silver coin, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that said notes may be reissued. It was declared in the act to be—

The established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the then legal ratio, or such other ratio as may be provided by law.

The action of the Secretary of the Treasury was so controlled by the above declaration as to prevent his exercising the discretion nominally vested in him. It is at once apparent that if the Secretary refused to pay these Treasury notes in gold, if demanded, they would stand discredited and would suffer a depreciation as obligations payable only in silver; this would destroy the parity between the two metals by establishing a discrimination in favor of gold.

More than $147,000,000 of these Treasury notes had been issued in payment for purchases of silver bullion by July 15, 1893. A large proportion of these notes given in the purchase of silver bullion had been paid in gold out of the Treasury. Between May 1, 1892, and July 15, 1893, these Treasury notes issued in payment of silver bullion amounted to a little more than $54,000,000, and during the same period about $49,000,000 was paid out by the Treasury in gold for the redemption of such notes.

This policy made the depletion of our Treasury gold reserves easy, and the European nations immediately took advantage of such an opportunity. Our gold reserves in the Treasury were promptly depleted. Between July 1, 1890, and July 15, 1893, the gold in our Treasury was decreased by more than $132,000,000, while during that same period the silver coin and bullion in our Treasury increased by more than $147,000,000.

The implacable law of economics could not be stayed even by an act of the Congress. Grimm's Law went grimly and irresistibly forward, and the cheaper metal drove the dearer metal out of circulation.

When the Silver Purchase Act of July 14, 1890, was enacted, it was hailed as sure to advance the price of the white metal. But the price of silver, obedient to economic law, went down, and down, and then further down as the purchases increased, until its price reached the lowest point ever known up to that time. The act of Congress designed to advance the price of silver was impotent in the face of economic law—the rule of supply and demand over prices.

The situation with the Treasury grew steadily worse notwithstanding the sales of Government bonds made to reinforce the gold reserves, and on the 1st day of December 1895, within less than 5½ years, there had been withdrawn from the Treasury nearly $375,000,000. Nearly $327,000,000 of the gold thus withdrawn, had been paid out on these Treasury notes and all the $346,000,000 was then still uncanceled and ready to be used to draw more gold from the Treasury.

In his special message to the Congress of August 8, 1893, and again in his third annual message of December 2, 1895, President Cleveland earnestly besought the Congress for remedial legislation. Meanwhile, on November 1, 1893, the silver purchase law had been repealed, but at that time the mischief had been done and the Treasury notes had been issued, which had wrecked our Treasury's gold reserve and made our fiscal system the gullible objective of the nations of Europe.

In his special message above referred to, President Cleveland used the following language, which has since become one of the high lights of Democratic doctrine with reference to our financial structure:

> The people of the United States are entitled to a sound and stable currency and to money recognized as such on every exchange and in every market of the world. Their Government has no right to injure them by financial experiments opposed to the policy and practice of other civilized states, nor is it justified in permitting an exaggerated and unreasonable reliance on our national strength and ability to jeopardize the soundness of the people's money.

Acts of Congress are potent impulses to apply to the advancement of economic theory. But even an act of Congress will not arrest the implacable laws of economics and evolution. They will move forward with the resistless power of the glacier down the mountainside.

It has been stated during this discussion that we are now living in a new era and that President Cleveland and even Thomas Jefferson lived in a different economic atmosphere and that their economic philosophy can in no wise apply to our problems. But in spite of these apparent differences, I am convinced of the living virility of the law of supply and demand and of the survival of the fittest. No act of Congress can thwart their operation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to propose an amendment to this bill, H.R. 9745, a bill unblushingly framed and presented for the benefit of the silver sharks and the swarms of speculators who swim around them, but desisted at the last moment.

Wall Street seems to have such a strangle hold upon the sentiment of this House that my feeble plea for one of the most ancient forms of currency seemed foredoomed to failure.

I refer to wampum, which was used by our ancestors for thousands of years before Columbus discovered America. Aye, even later, until Wall Street, with its ruthless methods of spoliation, polluted our shores and perpetrated the atrocious crime of 1873 and put it on a par with silver.

Why did the white man demonetize wampum? It certainly conforms to all the requirements of the quantitative theory of money. We have 10,000 miles of shore line, every mile of which is a vertible mine of wealth to those who sincerely believe the base of our currency should be expanded.

If you would strike out the references in this bill to silver and insert the word "wampum", you would accomplish the long-cherished desideratum of broadening the base of our monetary structure and of permanently remedying the serious maladjustment of our currency that has so long tortured the minds of our "brain trusters."

But enough of mere ratiocination! I disdain its use when the merits of the proposition are so manifest that even a child could understand its language.

Let me make the appeal to your hearts, my braves! Think of the gorgeous strings of wampum that adorned the breasts of our beauties, when, in the long-distant past, the stringing swish of our arrows set the leaves of the forest astir and the dread sickening thud of our tomahawks was heard in battle.

Then, on the practical side, think of our obligations to our loyal friends and neighbors, who, anticipating this projected effort to enhance the price of wampum, and with highly unselfish concern for its fate as the monetary base of our national currency, have stacked their tents with its stores. Shall we not think of them? We would be untrue to them, untrue to the parents who bore us, untrue to our children, untrue to those lofty ideals of humanity and friendship which have ever controlled our legislative policies, if we did not here and now wrest from the greedy hands of the gold and silver magnates their monopolistic control of those soul-destroying metals which have so long pressed their thorns relentlessly down on the brow of labor.

Let us restore once more the sanctified and "holey" wampum—the money of our fathers—to its once glorious place as the base of our Nation's currency. It is unquestionably of sufficient volume to meet the urgent needs of the red man, whose people are clamoring—aye, starving—for the want of more money.

With Government approval of wampum, there will be money for everybody; the quantitative school of thought will be victorious; prosperity will return; the American flag will wave again in triumph over a country happy and contented and the stars will shine again in benevolent splendor on the greatest and most prosperious nation in all the world.

CANCEL INTEREST ON LOANS ON ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. COLLINS o Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to exentd any remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I take a great deal of pride in my record touching veterans' legislation.

The Congress only has the power to declare war. In my judgment, when it votes to place the Nation in that status, by implication it pledges the Nation when peace shall have been restored to do justice to the fullest possible extent to those of our citizens who joined the colors pursuant to its act. Thus minded, I have advocated and supported every measure of relief, every measure of restitution, if it be possible to make restitution, to those who were called by act of Congress from the pursuits of peace to engage in war and its consequent effects.

A declaration of war means the loss of human lives. It means widows and orphans, wrecked homes, blasted plans and ambitions, ruined careers, maimed and pain-wracked bodies, destroyed minds. A few paltry dollars never can make amends. At best, if adequate, they may lighten the burden and make the future somewhat easier to endure.

After waiting more than 7 years, the veterans of the last war were given an adjusted-service certificate—not something that would be of immediate benefit to those in destitute circumstances, but payable 20 years hence. The only way a veteran in need may be immediately advantaged is to borrow on the security of his adjusted-service certificate. He is treated just like an ordinary commercial borrower that pledges his security and submits to an annual interest charge.

Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of the extent to which veterans have availed themselves of the loan privilege. I take it that a very large percentage have been compelled to resort to that course. Undoubtedly many of the borrowers never will be able to repay their loans. In that event a very large portion of the maturity value of certificates will have been eaten up by interest. I do not think that is right, equitable, or just. I feel that the holder of an adjusted-service certificate ultimately should be paid an amount equivalent to its full maturity value and not penalized because through force of circumstances he has found it necessary to borrow upon it to keep body and soul together in these times of wide-spread distress and destitution. Therefore, I am presenting today a bill that will effectuate my thought, that will remove any interest charge against an adjusted-service certificate. To do otherwise, in my judgment, would place the Government in the despicable position of profiting at the expense of those for whose plight, in a great many cases certainly, it is entirely responsible.

PUBLIC ROADS BILL

Mr. IMHOFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IMHOFF. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago it was my privilege to vote favorably on the passage of H.R. 8781, the public highways bill, a bill designed to increase employment by authorizing an appropriation to provide for emergency construction of public highways and related projects, and for other purposes.

I was glad to have a part in adding an amendment to this bill calling for an appropriation of $400,000,000, said amendment requiring that one-fourth, or not less than 25 percent, of this appropriation be expended upon county and township roads.

This amendment will mean that the State of Ohio will be allotted $4,000,000 to be spent upon school-bus routes, mail routes, and other township and county roads. In my State the appropriation for highway construction under the relief program was expended almost entirely on the main thoroughfares, and the township and county roads got comparatively nothing. Under the C.W.A. some work was done on these roads, but with the curtailment of the C.W.A. much of this work was left uncompleted.

This bill, if concurred in by the Senate, will correct these injustices and will do something worth while for the farmers, the school children, and the rural mail carriers. It will at least help to get them out of the mud.

I understand this is the first time in the history of the Nation that Congress has specifically directed the spending of Federal money on township and county roads, and I am proud to have had a part in it. This is a distinct victory for the people in the rural sections of our country from one end to the other.

It seems to me that it was high time that Congress was paying some attention to these forgotten people, who are in reality the very backbone of the Nation. The specific instructions as to the expenditure of this appropriation provide employment in most needed sections and give proper recognition to the most neglected of all our people in this respect, namely, the farmers, the school children, and the rural carriers.

On the day this legislation was passed Congress did itself proud.

THE NAVAL AFFAIRS SUBCOMMITTEE WHITEWASH OF AIRCRAFT PROCUREMENT

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a minority report on naval aircraft purchases.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the minority report on naval aircraft purchases.

The minority report is as follows:

MINORITY REPORT OF W. D. MCFARLANE, OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE INVESTIGATING AIRPLANE MANUFACTURE

Our committee met 20 days during February to hear the testimony or witnesses brought before us who were named to investigate the following:

1. To ascertain profits in manufacture of airplanes, airplane engines, and aeronautical equipment.
2. To ascertain if any profiteering has taken place.
3. To ascertain whether there has been any collusion between manufacturers with respect to Government contracts.
4. To ascertain whether the method of development and procurement can be improved.
5. Any other phases that may appear desirable to see that the Government interest is wholly protected.

ONLY THE NAVY'S SIDE OF TESTIMONY HEARD

Only Navy and former Navy officials and the representatives of the different companies selling the Navy aircraft equipment were called before the committee to testify. The writer requested that other parties, independent of the Navy, including those companies not doing business with the Navy, be called, and that expert aviators and aviation engineers, including Gen. William Mitchell and Mr. C. J. H. MacKenzie-Kennedy, be called before the committee to testify, and after considerable debate, finally, on February 27, the committee agreed to allow Gen. William Mitchell and Mr. C. J. H. MacKenzie-Kennedy to file written statements, which they did, but which statements were not read nor considered by the committee before adopting the report, favoring in every way the present plans of operation of naval aircraft purchase. Because of lack of sufficient evidence covering both sides of the different questions under investigation, I believe the report of the committee is premature and the evidence before the committee wholly insufficient to cover all sides of the question under investigation or to justify the majority report filed herein, completely approving all points under investigation, so far as the Navy Department is concerned.

FIRST PROPOSITION

"To ascertain profits in manufacture of airplanes, airplane engines, and aeronautical equipment."

How can we determine and declare whether or not the profits made by contractors from the Navy airplane business is moderate and reasonable, when the undisputed evidence in the record shows little or no competition is actually being had in the procurement of our warplane engines, as well as of warplanes and accessories? The names of the directors comprising the aircraft companies, which clearly establishes an interlocking directorate, showing the connections of these differently named companies, was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by me (p. 4977).

It shows the aviation industry as really a single company. If there is an air trust completely dominating the aircraft industry, as many people believe, and the chart substantiates, then how can this committee, on the record at this time, find the profits in the manufacture of airplanes and aircraft equipment to be moderate and reasonable, and especially in the face of the record showing that since the Aircraft Act of July 1926 the Navy's average cost for engines amounts to $8,793, while the Army's average cost for engines is $6,691 each; that Navy engines purchased under competitive bidding cost an average of $3,332, while the Army engines purchased under competitive bidding cost an average of $4,793. At this point I insert in the report an article from the Washington Evening Star of March 12, entitled "Warplane Engine Price Gap Probed—McCarl's Figures Show Wide Difference Between Army and Navy Figures", by the Associated Press, as follows:

"A wide difference in prices paid by the Army and Navy for airplane engines was disclosed today. Congressional investigators started a hunt for the cause of the gap.

"Representatives of both services had etimated the average cost at around $6,000 per motor. A statement by J. R. McCarl, the Comptroller General, emphatically disagreed with that figure.

"McCarl's list of contracts granted since July 1926 showed the War Department paid an average of $6,691 for 4,245 engines, while the Navy's average cost was $8,793 for 3,158 engines.

"The investigators were trying, also, to find out why 2 Army engines which were bought on competitive bids cost an average of $4,798, while 103 obtained by the Navy, also on competitive bids, cost $11,332.

"There were some differences in the engines, the investigators agreed, but they still wanted more information.

"'RUSH ORDERS' PUZZLE

"A puzzle over 'rush orders' put through in the last days of the Hoover administration was growing even more puzzling to House committeemen.

"The investigators had a new tabulation from McCarl of $10,000,000 worth of Army planes contracted for in the 3 months just before President Roosevelt took office.

"This showed that from January 11, 1933, through February 28, contracts for 653 engines and 136 airplanes, costing $9,405,172, were let by the War Department. The Navy had no contracts during this period.

"Of these, only a $1,414,227 contract, let to the Boeing Airplane Co. on January 11 for 136 airplanes, was held by the Comptroller to have been competitive.

"The other contracts, which McCarl ruled were not competitive, follow:

"Consolidated Aircraft Corporation, 10 planes, February 27, 1933, $615,863; Curtiss Airplane & Motor Co., Inc., 1 plane, February 21, $40,000, and 46 planes, February 27, $946,791; Douglas Aircraft Co., Inc., 24 planes, February 28, $440,304, and 6 planes, February 28, $292,013; Glenn L. Martin Co., 49 planes, January 17, $2,440,605.

"Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Co., 3 engines, February 4, $63,314; 255 engines, February 4, $1,251,962; 2 engines, February 7, $12,551; 20 engines, February 16, $130,889; 24 engines, February 28, $113,133.

"Wright Aeronautical Corporation, 2 engines, January 9, $15,085; 3 engines, January 11, $23,000; 52 engines, February 1, $451,444; 64 engines, February 24, $568,320; 92 engines, February 28, $585,671."

SECOND PROPOSITION

"To ascertain if any profiteering has taken place."

The majority report finds "The reason for the small average profit is to be found in the fact that the existence of the Naval Aircraft Factory at Philadelphia has probably served as an effective brake on the price of airplanes."

The record shows but 23 airplanes manufactured in this plant since 1923, and none manufactured since 1931, and the average unit price for manufacturing the last 11 planes in this plant was $125,541.30, as shown by complete record of the aircraft plant at Philadelphia, as furnished by the Navy Department, as follows:

NOTE 1.—The above costs are exclusive of engines, but inclusive of everything else, such as instruments, etc. The costs do not include the overhead expense of officers' salaries, plant maintenance, plant depreciation, purchase and supply salaries, and other clerical administrative expense that is properly figured in costs by private firms and which might be added; no charge for interest on investment in plant, amounting to $11,000,000, nor municipal, State, and Federal taxes. The foregoing shows that anything done by the Naval Aircraft Factory at Philadelphia is quite useless as a check of private airplane-manufacturing firms.

Next, the majority report states, "Furthermore, the naval personnel who have handled procurement matters have endeavored to carefully analyze price quotations and to appraise them in the light of all the technical information available", and that statement made in the face of the evidence above quoted which fails to show what salaries are paid and all personnel and maintenance expense. Surely Congress has not forgotten its investigation and experience with its credit mobilizer—a corporation organized by a few stockholders of the Union Pacific Railroad Co. to construct the Union Pacific Railroad Co. and which secured approximately 90 millions for performing work which was valued by a congressional committee at $40,000,000.

PURCHASES UNDER P.W.A. MADE WITH LITTLE OR NO COMPETITION

That being true this committee should be and the taxpayers at large are interested in knowing fully the reasons why it is necessary to pay the amounts listed for airplanes and parts and particularly why there was no real competition had in the procurement of aircraft equipment recently expended under the $7,500,000 P.W.A. allotment. The list of contracts for the purchase of airplanes, airplane engines, instruments, and equipment is as follows:

It seems that the price being paid for this equipment is excessively high, as shown by the above charts. If there is an Air Trust, as many of us believe, or a working agreement with the different aircraft concerns (which is the same thing) whereby they set the price the Government shall pay for this equipment, as the prices on much of this equipment indicate is being done, and it seems has been done, it is evident that much profiteering has taken place. It is true that since these different companies have reorganized into two principal holding corporations, the profits have been reduced. It is also true that in such reorganization in the holding corporations the Government has been deprived of hundreds of thousands of dollars in income taxes, that would have been paid by these different subsidiaries had they not been allowed to file consolidated returns through the holding corporation.

THE TRUST AND CONSOLIDATED RETURNS

As a result of my investigation of the income-tax returns of these different corporations, and the information thus disclosed (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 6080–6085, 6463, 6889–6892), there was furnished concrete evidence upon which Congress last week acted and abolished the right to file consolidated income-tax returns. This amendment will require many more millions in taxes to be paid into the Treasury by these large corporation chains.

The evidence shows the Navy examined the books of these companies at stated intervals and the division of overhead costs as to Army, Navy, and commercial business apportioned by the company for costs purposes. The evidence shows there is little or no competition in the amounts paid for war engines and war planes. A compilation since the Aircraft Act of 1926 shows that Army expenditures for aircraft total $57,346,098, with competitive contracts amounting to only $3,336,634, while the Navy expenditures during this time were $53,026,614, with competitive contracts amounting to $5,901,051, and noncompetitive contracts amounting to $47,125,563.

We have no testimony in the record showing what other engine and plane manufacturing concerns not doing business with the Navy could and would have charged the Government for this material.

THIRD PROPOSITION

"To ascertain whether there has been any collusion between manufacturers with respect to Government contracts."

The chart attached under the first proposition clearly shows the interlocking directorate and the connections existing between the different aircraft concerns in this country today, giving an ample voice in each other's affairs. The testimony shows these principal concerns pool their patents, which is a powerful weapon and can be used to force understandings and agreements on price, and according to the way the Government contracts on engines and planes have been awarded it seems that the contracts on both engines and planes have been fairly well distributed between the subsidiaries of the two principal holding corporations, to wit: United Aircraft & Transport Corporation and the Curtiss-Wright Corporation. Of the 4,245 engines purchased by the Army since the Aircraft Act of 1926, 2,492 were purchased from Pratt & Whitney, and 1,153 from Wright, 587 from Wright subsidiaries, and only 13 from all other engine manufacturers together. Since the Aircraft Act of 1926 the Navy obtained 2,149 engines from Pratt & Whitney, 971 from Wright, 2 from Wright subsidiaries, and 36 from all others. Most of the airplanes have been secured from six companies, most of which companies head up directly through the above-named holding corporations or have direct or indirect connections with them.

Mr. Fleet, of the Consolidated Aircraft Corporation, testified that 50 planes had been sold to the Army at $1 each, because of excessive profits earned under an Army contract which was let without competition. Because of existing contractural provisions existing between the Army and Navy each branch should receive the benefit in price given the other, and it, therefore, seems that the Navy Department should have received the same concession made the Army, since the Navy was buying similar planes from them at that time. The 50 planes delivered to the Army at $1 each were valued at $6,000 each, or $300,000, and according to the company's records this concern still had a profit of 25 percent after delivering the planes.

We cannot tell from the testimony in the record whether or not there are conflicts in the prices charged our Government for warplanes and warplane engines as compared to prices charged foreign governments for the same equipment. As I remember the testimony, there is no accurate information in the record telling us just exactly the charges made between the different governments for this kind of aircraft equipment and just exactly the kind and character of aircraft equipment furnished the different governments for the prices quoted. We, therefore, cannot definitely tell from the record in its present condition whether or not there has been any collusion between manufacturers with respect to Government contracts.

FOURTH PROPOSITION

"To ascertain whether the method of development and procurement can be improved."

The majority report finds: "That the policy pursued by the Navy Department since the adoption of the Aircraft Procurement Act of 1926 is a practical and prudent one and should be followed until a better plan is proposed."

CONGRESSIONAL INTENT ON AIRCRAFT ACT OF 1926

The Aircraft Act of 1926 was perfected after extensive hearings and investigations by a committee appointed for that purpose, and after a thorough discussion in Congress as shown by the RECORD in the passage of the bill. In the enactment of this legislation the intent of Congress was clearly shown by the speeches made when the measure was passed, that it was the clear intention of Congress to have open competitive bidding by advertisements in at least three of the leading aeronautical journals.

In adopting the free conference report on the Aircraft Act of 1926, on page 12259 of the RECORD, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, Mr. McSWAIN said:

"Mr. McSWAIN. Rather than eliminate publicity, rather than cut out competition and bidding, as was the recommendation of the Lampert and Morrow committees, we have not doubled it merely but we have multiplied it by at least 10, so that now the light is to be turned on from every angle. It is true that there is discretion in the Secretary to decide which is the lowest responsible bidder, which one can best build the aircraft for the safety of the lives of the men who are to fly them in time of peace and time of war.

"Mr. GRIFFIN. But you eliminated that.

"Mr. McSWAIN. The discretion still rests with the Secretary of War to decide that question and there is publicity from the very first proposition of inviting competition in the matter of design contest, competition in the building and construction contract, and there is light turned on in this."

But the fundamental defect in the law was and is, that the independent agency of Congress, the General Accounting Office, was not only denied the authority to see that this intention was carried out but was actually and specifically, by the language of the act, denied this authority by making the decisions of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy final and conclusive (sec. 10 (t)). In the procurement of new designs in aircraft or aircraft parts or aeronautical accessories, as clearly defined under sections 10 (A) to (E) of said act, the principal dispute that has arisen concerning the construction of this act is paragraph K of section 10 of the act, reading as follows:

"The Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy may at his discretion purchase abroad or in the United States with or without competition, by contract, or otherwise, such designs, aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories as may be necessary in his judgment for experimental purposes in the development of aircraft or aircraft parts or aeronautical accessories of the best kind for the Army or the Navy, as the case may be, and if as a result of such procurement, new and suitable designs considered to be the best kind for the Army or the Navy are developed, he may enter into contract, subject to the requirements of paragraph (j) of this section, for the procurement in quantity of such aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories without regard to the provisions of paragraphs (a) to (e), inclusive, hereof."

DECISIONS OF JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL OF NAVY CONSTRUING AIRCRAFT ACT OF 1926, REQUIRING COMPETITION

I requested Rear Admiral O. G. Murfin, Judge Advocate General of the Navy, on March 5, 1934, to furnish me with a copy of the opinions of his Department construing section 10 of the Aircraft Act and every opinion rendered by the Judge Advocate General's Department in construing section 10 (K) is in substance as follows:

JANUARY 21, 1931.

From: The Judge Advocate General.
To: Secretary of the Navy.
Subject: Procurement policy under section 10, paragraph (k) of the act of July 2, 1926.

1. The Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics in the basic letter requests that the Secretary of the Navy authorize the procurement of aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories under section 10, subsection (k) of the act approved July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. 787) when, in the opinion of the Navy Department, such procurement is in the best interests of the Government. The Bureau proposes, in the event of approval of its request, to recommend production orders under the said subsection (k):

(1) When the experimental article has demonstrated superior characteristics of design or performance over existing types and the Bureau believes the military value warrants a production order, and

(2) When the negotiated price for the production order is considered fair and reasonable.

2. The said subsection (k) of section 10, quoted below, is divided into two parts, (a) and (b), for convenience in identifying them in subsequent references:

(a) "The Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy may at his discretion purchase abroad or in the United States with or without competition, by contract or otherwise, such designs, aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories as may be necessary in his judgment for experimental purposes in the development of aircraft or aircraft parts or aeronautical accessories of the best kind for the Army or the Navy, as the case may be, and

(b) "If as a result of such procurement, new and suitable designs considered to be the best kind for the Army or the Navy are developed, he may enter into contract, subject to the requirements of paragraph (j) of this section, for the procurement in quantity of such aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories without regard to the provisions of paragraphs (a) to (e), inclusive, hereof."

3. With reference to (a) above, it will be noted that the Secretary of the Navy has discretionary authority, thereunder to purchase "abroad or in the United States, with or without competition, by contract or otherwise", such aircraft as may be necessary in his judgment for experimental purposes in the development of aircraft of the best kind for the Navy. Under this part of subsection (k) if the Secretary of the Navy shall determine administratively that further experiments with this type of plane are necessary in the development of aircraft of the best kind for the Navy, additional planes may be purchased of domestic manufacturers for experimentation under the same conditions as the first plane, namely, "with or without competition, by contract or otherwise." The War Department under this part of subsection (k) has purchased without competition from the company furnishing the experimental airplane, 2 and 3 additional planes for further experimental purposes and in one instance 15 additional planes for issue to the various training stations for further experimentation.

4. With reference to (b) of subsection (k) above, the question of the scope of this paragraph as permitting or not permitting the purchase of additional planes on a quantity basis, without competition, has been the subject of divergent views ever since its enactment, the Air Services of both the Army and Navy contending for an interpretation that would permit the purchase without competition of additional airplanes from the designer whose plane originally obtained for experimental use has proved satisfactory for service use, and the legal officers of the two departments uniformly holding that competition was necessary unless the additional planes were for further experimentation.

5. A chronological statement from the official record in this connection is given below:

Under date of December 4, 1926, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Aeronautics, in reference (a), after referring to the fact that the legal authorities of the Army and Navy were then in substantial agreement on the interpretation of paragraph (k), gave his interpretation of this paragraph that would permit purchase on a quantity basis without competition in the same manner as the procurement of the original experimental plane after the latter had demonstrated on tests its satisfactoriness for service use.

6. Under date of December 11, 1926, the Judge Advocate General, in reference (b), after reviewing the effect of the various sections of the Aircraft Procurement Act, held that "procurement in quantity in accordance with a design purchased under paragraph (k), whether subsequently altered or not, must be accomplished in pursuance of existing law relating to the purchase of naval supplies, and the proposals received for production in accordance with such a design must be accompanied by written guarantees, and the contracts by bonds." Owing to the fact that at the time there was no case pending requiring a decision, the Secretary of the Navy did not act upon this opinion.

7. Under date of February 12, 1927, the Judge Advocate General, in reference (c), stated that "on a consideration of subsection (k) both as a unit and as divisible into two parts, I am of the opinion that it lacks the express terms that are requisite to a grant of power to award the quantity-production contracts contemplated by the second part of the subsection until the matter shall have been subjected to competition, and that such power cannot be derived by inference from the language actually used in the subsection."

8. Under date of February 5, 1927, the Solicitor of the Navy Department, in reference (f), commenting upon reference (e), stated that—

"The privilege to award contracts without competition must be given in express terms to effect the repeal or waiver of the express terms used in the statutes that require such competition. Otherwise the privilege is not granted. The discretionary power granted by the first part of (k) plainly relates directly to purchases for experimentation, and unless there is express intention or indisputable inference that such discretion shall apply to some other official duty, it can be applied only to the one it plainly designates. Clearly enough it seems such discretionary power is not by express language directly applied in (k) to the awarding of the contemplated quantity-production contracts. Hence its application to the making of such contracts must be by inference if it is to be found in the provision."

9. Under date of December 13, 1927, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Aeronautics, in reference (g), requested the Judge Advocate General to make a study of a proposed revision of subsection (k), for submission to the Congress, that would permit the buying of aircraft in quantity without competition.

10. Under date of December 16, 1927, the Judge Advocate General, in reference (h), submitted to the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Aeronautics a revision of this subsection (k) that he considered would confer upon the Secretary of the Navy the desired authority.

11. Under date of January 12, 1928, the Secretary of the Navy, by reference (i), submitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives the revised draft of section (k) prepared by the Judge Advocate General, with a recommendation that it be enacted into law.

12. This proposed legislation, introduced January 16, 1928, by the Honorable CARL VINSON (H.R. 9359), was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. This bill was not reported out of the committee.

13. The Judge Advocate General of the Army, under date of May 17, 1929, with the approval of the Assistant Secretary of War, held that the quantity production contemplated under subsection (k) must be obtained as a result of advertising pursuant to Revised Statutes 3709, and under date of August 3, 1929, held with the approval of the Secretary of War that he was "constrained to adhere to the opinion expressed in the opinion addressed to you under date of May 17, 1929, that quantity procurement authorized in the later portion of paragraph (k), section 10, of the act of July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. 787), must be made after advertising pursuant to section 3709, Revised Statutes."

14. In conclusion this office is of the opinion that:

(a) The Secretary of the Navy has full authority to purchase planes abroad or in the United States, with or without competition, by contract or otherwise, as may be necessary in his judgment for experimental purposes in the development of aircraft of the best kind for the Navy, and that this authority includes the right to acquire additional planes for further experimental purposes under the same conditions as the original planes upon an administrative determination, by the Secretary of the Navy, that the additional planes are needed for further experimental use.

(b) While recognizing the equitable considerations that prompt the recommendation in the basic letter, this office is constrained to adhere to the opinion rendered in its endorsement of February 12, 1927, that secton (k) lacks the express terms that are requisite to a grant of power to award the quantity production contract until the matter shall have been subjected to competition, and that such power cannot be derived by inference from the language actually used in the subsection.

(c) The only manner in which the authority to make such further purchases, without competition, of additional planes, for other than experimental use, as recommended by the Bureau of Aeronautics, can be legally affected is through the enactment of legislation in the form of H.R. 9359, referred to in paragraph 12 above.

D. F. SELLERS.

SECRETARY OF NAVY WILBUR REQUESTS LAW BE CHANGED ELIMINATING COMPETITION

Secretary Wilbur requested Congress to enact the following bill:

H.R. 9359, Seventieth Congress (1928) first session, reads as follows:

"A bill to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide more effectively for the national defense by increasing the efficiency of the Air Corps of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes", approved July 2, 1926

"Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph (K) of section 10 of the act approved July 2, 1926 (44 Stat.L., p. 787), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(K) The Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy may at his discretion purchase abroad or in the United States with or without competition by contract, or otherwise, such designs, aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories as may be necessary in his judgment for experimental purposes in the development of aircraft or aircraft parts or aeronautical accessories of the best kind for the Army or the Navy, as the case may be, and if as a result of such procurement, new and suitable designs considered to be the best kind for the Army or the Navy are developed, he may, at his discretion, with or without a competition, enter into contract, subject to the requirements of paragraph (J) of this section, for the procurement in quantity of such aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories without regard to the provisions of paragraphs (a) to (e), inclusive, hereof."

Thus it will be seen that the Navy Department recognizes, by asking that the above section be amended and by the unbroken line of decisions of the Judge Advocate General of the Navy from the enactment of this act in 1926 to date, that they did not and do not have the right to procure aircraft, aircraft parts, or accessories, under section 10(k), without open competitive bidding, and as shown by the following letter of Hon. H. L. Roosevelt, Acting Secretary of the Navy:

MARCH 12, 1934.

MY DEAR MR. MCFARLANE: Referring to our telephonic conversation this morning, you are informed that the papers transmitted to you by the Judge Advocate General's letter of March 5, 1934, are to be regarded as indicating the views entertained by the Navy Department at this time respecting the interpretation of section 10 of the Aircraft Procurement Act approved July 2, 1926, inasmuch as the opinions which they expressed or which are deducible therefrom have not since been modified by this Department or by higher legal authority of the Government.

Sincerely yours,

H. L. ROOSEVELT,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

The officers in charge of the administrative positions of the Navy since July 2, 1926, are as follows:

Mr. Curtis D. Wilbur, Secretary of Navy, March 19, 1924, to March 4, 1929.

Mr. Edward P. Warner, Assistant Secretary of Navy for Aeronautics, July 10, 1926, to March 15, 1929.

Mr. Charles Francis Adams, Secretary of Navy, March 5, 1929, to March 4, 1933.

Mr. David S. Ingalls, Assistant Secretary of Navy for Aeronautics, March 16, 1929, to June 1, 1932.

Mr. Claude A. Swanson, Secretary of Navy, March 4, 1933 to date.

Mr. H. L. Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of Navy, March 4, 1933, to date.

However, the opinions of the Judge Advocate General of the Navy are only advisory and have no controlling effect on the Secretary of the Navy and his subordinates. Had this 1926 act not departed from the procedure existing for more than a century and taken away from the Comptroller General the jurisdiction to review these aircraft contracts, he would have rendered decisions in these matters and such decisions would have been the controlling factor of these contracts. Possibly this investigation would not have been necessary.

I attach hereto complete statement of airplanes, engines, and accessories purchased by the Navy Department under this act as shown by the contracts on file in the Comptroller General's Office, which accurately show the method of procurement by the Navy of its different classes of aircraft equipment and these figures and classifications do not agree with the Navy Department figures as inserted in the hearings.

According to the above charts the Army and Navy have purchased $110,000,000 of equipment; the Army has purchased $57,346,098, of which $3,336,634 was by competitive bidding, or 92 percent of their contracts during this period were let without competitive bids; the Navy purchased $53,026,614, of which $5,901,051 was purchased through competitive bids, or 91.3 percent of the Navy's aircraft equipment was purchased without competitive bids. The Aircraft Act of 1926 as enacted gives the War and Navy Departments special privileges not enjoyed by the other aeronautical branches of the Government, to wit: Coast Guard, Department of Commerce, and the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, and these two Departments according to the above record have openly and notoriously disregarded the plain letter of the law of Congress, the decisions of the Judge Advocate General of each Department, and have continued from the date the act became effective to the present time to knowingly, wantonly, and willfully violate the plain letter of the law in the procurement of their aircraft as shown by the above charts. The following article published by the Washington Post on March 12, 1934, is very pertinent and gives a clear picture of the situation, which article reads as follows:

NINETY-TWO PERCENT ARMY'S PLANES BOUGHT WITHOUT BIDS—MCCARL MOVES TO PLACE CURB ON SPENDING WITHOUT CHECK

Comptroller General McCarl is drafting an amendment to the act of July 2, 1926, whereby Army and Navy contracts for airplanes will be passed upon by the General Accounting Office, and the intent of the act, calling for competitive bidding, will be carried out.

The disclosure that more than 92 percent of all the Army's and Navy's aircraft purchases since passage of the act had been made through negotiated contracts with a few big companies caused the House Military Affairs Subcommittee on Aviation to request McCarl to draw up the amendment.

Less than 8 percent of the $110,000,000 spent by the two Services for airplanes and engines since 1926 was expended after competitive bidding, as the act intended, the Comptroller General advised the Rogers investigating committee.

FEW COMPETITIVE BIDS

Army expenditures for aircraft in the 7½ years totaled $57,346,098, with competitive contracts amounting to only $3,336,634.

Navy expenditures in that time were $53,026,614, with competitive contracts totaling $13,694,533.

However, the Navy's competitive total includes $7,793,482 spent for the dirigibles Akron and Macon, and it was generally agreed that, while bids were called for, only one company in the United States could build these ships.

From July 1926 through December 1933 the Army bought 4,245 engines and 1,857 planes. Only two of the engines were contracted for after proper competition, according to McCarl.

In the same period, the Navy bought 3,158 engines—103 as a result of competitive bidding—and 1,076 airplanes.

Armed with these figures and with a mass of testimony involving charges of an Air Trust the Rogers committee determined yesterday to learn why huge contracts were passed out to individual companies without competition.

Nearly all the engines bought by the Army and Navy, the Comptroller General's figures show, were obtained through negotiated contracts with the Pratt-Whitney Aircraft Co. and the Wright Aeronautical Corporation.

Of its 4,245 engines, the Army bought 2,492 from Pratt-Whitney, 1,153 from Wright, 587 from a Wright subsidiary, and only 13 from all other engine manufacturers.

The Navy obtained 2,149 from Pratt-Whitney, 971 from Wright, 2 from the Wright subsidiary, and 36 from all others.

SIX PLANE COMPANIES FAVORED

Most of the airplanes for the two Services came from six big companies, and witnesses before the Rogers committee have alleged these companies are connected, through stock ownership and interlocking directorates, with the two leading engine builders.

The Comptroller General's frequent protests against these negotiated contracts were answered by the War Department—chiefly by the Air Corps—with quotations from the law which says the General Accounting Office has no control over such contracts. This Office passes upon all other Government contracts and the Rogers committee intends to have the act of July 2, 1926, amended to bring aircraft procurement under the eye and supervision of Comptroller General McCarl.

In contrast to military and naval procurement methods, the Comptroller General's report to the committee pointed to Commerce Department purchases of aircraft over which McCarl has jurisdiction.

From July 1926 through December 1933, the Commerce Department spent $294,141 for airplanes and engines, and only $22,325—for one plane needed in an emergency—was expended through negotiation, the rest being bought after competitive bidding.

NAVY OFFICIALS AND COMPANIES SELLING EQUIPMENT WANT NO CHANGE IN PROCUREMENT LAW

All Navy and former Navy officials, as well as all those who testified for the companies selling the Navy equipment, expressed the opinion in substance that no changes should be made in the law as it is written, each and every one of whom knows or should have known that he had or was violating the provisions of said law, and in direct violation of an unbroken line of decisions of both the Judge Advocate Generals of the Navy and the Army since 1926 to date, in the procurment of aircraft, and that open competitive bidding as required under the provisions of the said law in the procurement of aircraft were not being complied with.

FIFTH PROPOSITION

Any other phases that may appear desirable to see that the Government is wholly protected.

I believe we are all vitally interested and want to know our position in the air. On March 6, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (pp. 3853–3862) charts prepared by Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy, comparing the leading warplanes and warplane-engine performances of the world. I endorse the information contained in these charts as being the latest and best information we have on the comparisons made and the subject covered.

On March 21, I requested Dr. Albert F. Zahm, Chief of the Division of Aeronautics of the Library of Congress, to furnish me with a statement analyzing these charts. On March 24, I received the following reply from Dr. Albert F. Zahm:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
DIVISION OF AERONAUTICS,
Washington, March 24, 1934.

Hon. W. D. MCFARLANE,
House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MCFARLANE: In reply to your inquiry of March 21, 1934, regarding the Mackenzie-Kennedy charts of the world's leading warplane engines and warplanes, I have pleasure in reporting as follows:

After several days' careful checking of the charts against information readily available in this division, we find substantial agreement in most of the items. In some cases where differences are to be accommodated, we are asking Major Mackenzie-Kennedy to cite his original sources so that we may compare them with our. The final result will be at your service. To make a complete check of these charts, however, we should have access to the unpublished aeronautic data of the United States war Services.

From my various conferences with Major Mackenzie-Kennedy, in the past 5 weeks, I realize that he has made careful use of extended and recent sources in order to ensure the exactness of his charts, along with their obvious convenience and utility. He does not seem to understate the case for America though indicating that her warplane engines are deficient in power, especially at combat altitudes.

Since the charts give at a glance vitally important information understandable by all our citizens, it seems desirable to have similar ones prepared yearly for the use of those agencies officially concerned with the national defense.

To that end one might recommend the appointment of a committee of Federal experts having access to all sources of aerotechnical information, whether open or confidential, to prepare at-a-glance charts accompanied with sufficient notes and references to make their verification easy. The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, for example, has a foreign agent constantly gathering such data, and has several subcommittees comprising Army, Navy, and other officers of the Government who jointly furnish information on technical questions.

On request of the Advisory Committee I have sent it photostats of the charts which Major Mackenzie-Kennedy, on my solicitation, has kindly presented to this Library with permission to duplicate for the benefit of other branches of the Government.

Very truly yours,

A. F. ZAHM, Chief Division of Aeronautics.

In the above letter you will note that Dr. Zahm states: "From my various conferences with Major Mackenzie-Kennedy, in the past 5 weeks, I realize that he has made careful use of extended and recent sources in order to ensure the exactness of his charts, along with their obvious convenience and utility. He does not seem to understate the case for America though indicating that her warplane engines are deficient in power, especially at combat altitudes."

This statement of Dr. Zahm after careful investigation is worthy of serious consideration. It must be borne in mind that Dr. Zahm, as Chief of the Division of Aeronautics of the Library of Congress, has at his disposal more than 20,000 volumes on aeronautics, which is the largest library on aeronautics in the world.

I have frequently consulted Dr. Zahm on the subject and the latest information I have received from him concerning these charts is his letter of April 25, 1934, reading as follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
DIVISION OF AERONAUTICS,
Washington, April 25, 1934.

Hon. W. D. MCFARLANE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MCFARLANE: Complying with your request of April 23, I furnish herewith duplicates of the letter and marked charts which I sent to Mr. Delaney, April 20.

The figures as revised show on the average substantial agreement of the Mackenzie-Kennedy data with those in Jane's All the World's Aircraft of 1933.

For example, in table I the original chart numbers for engine power have 70 in perfect agreement with Jane, 24 too low, marked red; 11 too high, marked green.

To make the 24 too-low chart numbers agree with Jane, they must be increased in percentage, respectively, 12, 7, 10, 22, 1.5, 9.5, 20, 8.3, 14.6, 12.5, 3.4, 11.4, 3.6, 3.6, 3.1, 2.1, 7.7, 5.6, 25.7, 35, 6.7, 2. The sum is 255.1, which divided by 24 gives the average discrepancy as 10.65 percent.

To make the 11 too-high chart numbers agree with Jane they must be decreased in percentage, respectively, 4, 37.1, 8.4, 16.7, 2.9, 5.5, 10.6, 11.1, 4.8, 2.2, 16. The sum is 119.3, which divided by 11 gives 10.9 percent.

Dividing the total percentages of error 374.4 by the number of checked items 105, gives 374.4/105=3.58 percent. Hence in table I the original engine power figures differ from those of Jane by an average of 3.58 percent.

This may be called substantial agreement.

Analyzing in the same way the figures for maximum speed and speed at 10,000 feet altitude, given for warplanes in table III, we find they differ from Jane's by an average of 2.7 percent; viz, there is substantial average agreement.

In the same table the chart values for war-service ceiling differ from Jane's by an average of 4.5 percent.

Similarly in table I the chart figures for United States engine power are found to fall below those of Jane by an average of 1.75 percent, viz, table I does not materially understate the case for the United States, as far as checked.

In table III the chart figures for maximum United States warplane speed fall below Jane's by an average of 0.8 percent; at 10,000 feet the checked chart figures agree with those of Jane; the chart values for war-service ceiling differ from Jane's by 3.45 percent. Hence table III does not materially understate the case for the United States as far as checked.

These charts do not purport to furnish figures later than 1933; hence they do not indicate the capacities of the world's warplanes and engines at the present moment.

Very truly yours,

A. F. ZAHM, Chief, Division of Aeronautics.

I insert at this point the charts so checked by Dr. Zahm as being the latest information available on this subject. The charts were prepared from very many sources of information of which Jane's All the World's Aircraft was only one.

NOTE 1.—122 different warplanes have been compared in table III.

NOTE 2.—Tail-gun stations on the warplanes in secs. H, I, and J are behind the tail surfaces. For defensive armament, the use of such a tail gun station gives a warplane 50 percent superiority over a warplane without it.

NOTE 3.—Only the speeds of warplanes at war-service altitudes have been compared in table IV. If rate of climb, war-service ceiling, useful load, and armament were also to be included, the United States average deficiency would be much worse, approximating engine table II.

NOTE 4.—The deficiency figures for the United States in sec. I have been omitted from the average deficiency totals, as the U.S. Army heavy bomber has been superseded by the United States fighter-bomber.

NOTE 5.—Soviet Russia is manufacturing warplanes of its own design, and of German and Italian design. It may be considered as not weaker than the United States in warplanes.

NOTE 6.—A=Air-cooled; P=Prestone-cooled; W=Water-cooled; B=Biplane M=Monoplane; S=Sesquiplane (1½ plane).

The above charts and figures being true it is very evident that the performance of our warplanes and warplane engines are in no position whatever to successfully compete with such planes of several other nations.

This being true it is very evident that a large part of the money we have been spending annually for aviation has been wasted and practically the only benefit we have received has been the training given our aviators, and apparently even this training has been with obsolete and unsatisfactory equipment if the showing made recently by the Army Air Corps in flying the mail is to be taken as a criterion.

THE PRESENT WORLD POSITION OF THE UNITED STATES AIR FORCES

I find that according to an expert the present world position of the United States air forces is as follows:

First. Not higher up than third of the nations in merely the number of warplanes. Three other nations, namely, Italy, Soviet Russia, and Japan, are so close to the United States in this connection that it would be easy for some authorities to place this country sixth of the nations.

Second. Not higher up than sixth of the nations in the number of factories manufacturing warplanes or high-powered airplane engines. In fact, the United States can easily be classed as eighth of the nations in this respect as shown in detail hereinafter.

Third. Definitely the most backward of all the nations manufacturing warplane engines and warplanes in the design of them in service and projected.

Fourth. Its leading warplanes are most deficient in elasticity of performance.

Fifth. Its leading warplanes cannot even reach similar foreign planes to do battle with them.

Sixth. Comparatively, it does not actually make or possess any warplanes.

Seventh. The whole of its air forces could probably be grounded and rendered useless or destroyed by the tiny Belgian air force, given the same type of warplane pilots as the principal combatant nations had in the World War.

Eighth. The whole of its air forces could be grounded and rendered useless or destroyed by 30 percent of the British Royal Air Force, or 40 percent of the French air force, or 50 percent of each of the Italian, Japanese, or Soviet Russian air forces.

Ninth. It will take at least 2 years to catch up with the outside world in design, production, and availability of warplane engines and warplanes if it begins to produce the leading types of these devices under license from the original foreign manufacturers; and at least 3 to 4 years if it proceeds without such foreign licenses, and if the foreign nations concerned stop progress meanwhile.

Tenth. The United States has as much to defend in the sense of actual wealth as the British Empire.

The United States air forces decidedly cannot fight when they like, where they like, or how they like.

The preceding would seem to be emphasized by recent experience with air-mail transport.

The warplane-engine factories of the world, exclusive of diesel engines, are as follows:

Position	Country	Number of factories	Names of factories
1	France------	7	Delage, Farman, Gnome-Rhone, Hispano-Suiza, Lorraine, Potey, and Renault.
2	Japan------	5	Aitcha (Lorraine under French license and own air-cooled radial engines), Kawanisi (Rolls-Royce under British license), Kawasaki (B.M.W. under German license), Mitsubishi (Armstrong-Siddeley under British license and Hispano-Suiza under French license and Junkers under German license), Nakajima (Lorraine under French license and Bristol "Jupiter" under British license).
3	Great Britain---	4	Armstrong-Siddeley, Bristol, Napier, and Rolls-Royce.
4	Germany------	4	B.M.W., Junkers, Mercedes-Benz, and Siemens Halske.
5	Soviet Russia---	4	Amstro (B.M.W. under German license and Hispano-Suiza under French license), Ikar (Bristol "Jupiter" under British license and own water-cooled types), Motor (B.M.W. under German license and Gnome-Rhone under French license), "9 Zawod", translated means "Ninth Factory" (B.M.W. under German license). A series of "M" air-cooled radial engines is also being manufactured in Soviet Russia. Besides the preceding, the British-made Napier "Lion" engines; the French-made Lorraine engines; and the German-made Junkers engines are used. The said factories can produce at least 80 warplane engines per week at present on a peace footing.
6	Italy------	3	Alfa-Romeo, Fiat, and Isotta-Fraschini.
7	Czechoslovakia.	3	Avia, Praga, and Walters.
8	United States of America.	2	Pratt & Whitney and Wright Aeronautical Corporation, both making only moderately high-powered airplane engines. These factories make principally air-cooled radial engines, the United States being strongly biased in favor of such engines. However, the Wright Corporation also makes the only type of moderately high-powered, liquid-cooled airplane engine in the United States. The United States makes no warplane engines according to the understanding of such an engine abroad. By comparison it resembles a person of athletic appearance but with a weak heart. Thus, the position of the United States is a good eighth with regard to warplane engine factories; in fact, even this places it too far forward. Besides this, it is to be seen that this country has practically all its eggs in one basket, even for production of moderately high-powered airplane engines. The warplane engine has long passed its "horse-and-buggy" stage of the World War. It is not now possible for the United States to repeat its feat with the "Liberty 12" installation in that war, in connection with the modern warplane engine. The grave difficulties experienced by the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Co., Inc., of Buffalo, N.Y., and all other aviation factories in the United States, with warplane production during the World War should not have been consigned to oblivion. In consequence they will now be much greater. It is only possible now to use efficient commercial-type airplanes as very poor auxiliaries in war. In fact, they are basically as far as possible removed from modern war service. The lore acquired by their pilots and crews has to be jettisoned and replaced by real warplane experience before such pilots and crews can be usefully employed in war—qualified to face the deadly air attacks of only seconds in duration. Finally, the United States air forces are hybrid to such extent, owing to civilian engineering and operational influence, that it is doubtful that they can perform either war service or civil transportation satisfactorily.

The aforesaid foreign warplane-engine factories are large factories with more war experience than any corresponding factory in the United States. Many of these foreign factories are world famous for the best of reasons—excellence of products in war and in peace. All of these factories are in the position to swing into maximum production at the peak of possible improvement of their products on the outbreak of war. This cannot be said of any United States aviation-engine factory.

The Mitsubishi Aircraft Co., Ltd., of Nagoya, Japan, is an example of the size of the said foreign factories. In 1931 it covered 59 acres and had 2,500 employees. Now it covers about 70 acres and has over 4,000 employees. It is a branch of the great Japanese armament, engineering, and shipbuilding firm at Mitsubishi, Busan & Kaisha, and was originally sponsored by the giant British armament firm of Vickers, Ltd., to which no United States manufacturer can even approach for war experience throughout the world.

COMPARATIVE FRONTAL AREAS OF WATER-COOLED AND AIR-COOLED WARPLANE ENGINES

The superiority for airplanes and warplane performance of the high-powered, water-cooled engine over the corresponding air-cooled radial engine, which is recognized abroad, is demonstrated by the following table of frontal areas:

Engine type	Approximate frontal area engine (square feet)	Approximate frontal area radiator (square feet)	Make of engine
6-cylinder in line	3	1½-2	German, Junkers Jumo-4.
12-cylinder "V"	4	1½-2	British, Rolls-Royce; French, Hispano-Suiza; etc.
14-cylinder radial (44-inch diameter).	10	----------	American, Pratt & Whitney (Twin Wasp Jr.).
14-cylinder radial (48-inch diameter).	12	----------	American, Pratt & Whitney (Twin Wasp).
9-cylinder radial (56-inch diameter).	16	----------	American, Pratt & Whitney (Hornet T.I.C.).

The water-cooled engines are much easier to "stream line", and have the additional advantage of affording much better visibility for the pilot-gunner in the fighter types of warplanes—a matter of greatest importance. The Townend ring and N.A.C.A. cowling have helped to reduce the frontal resistance of air-cooled engines slightly, enabling increase of the speed of the plane by a few miles per hour. The disadvantages of increased weight of cooling equipment are more than offset by the greatly reduced frontal area and lighter and better stream lining possibilities of the water-cooled engine.

The weights per rated horsepower of water-cooled engines usually include only the air-screw hub, magnetoes, carburetors, supercharger, and gearing, if any. The weight of the radiator, cooling water, piping, and so forth, is equal to about 0.4 to 0.5 pound per rated horsepower.

THE AIR TRUST

Investigation has disclosed the shackled state of the aviation industry of the United States.

The structure of that portion of the aviation industry of the United States which is producing warplane engines and warplanes is assembled as follows:

(a) The United Aircraft & Transport Corporation, New York, N.Y., which comprises the following:

First. Boeing Airplane Co., Seattle, Wash., airplanes and warplanes.

Second. Stearman Aircraft Co., Wichita, Kans., airplanes.

Third. Sikorsky Aircraft Corporation, Bridgeport, Conn., airplanes and warplanes.

Fourth. Chance-Vought Corporation, East Hartford, Conn., warplanes.

Fifth. Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Co., East Hartford, Conn., P. & W. Wasp and Hornet air-cooled radial airplane and warplane engines.

Sixth. Hamilton Propeller Co., East Hartford, Conn., airplane and warplane propellers.

Seventh. Boeing School of Aeronautics, Oakland, Calif., flying service.

Eighth. United Aircraft Exports, Inc., New York, N.Y.

Ninth. Boeing Aircraft of Canada, Ltd., Vancouver, British Columbia.

This group of firms, probably the largest aircraft trust in the United States, is not free to make its own decisions on aviation matters. Possibly its technical and other material becomes speedily known to foreign countries. It is controlled by the National City Co. and the National City Bank of New York and by the Morgan international financial interests.

(b) The Goodyear-Zeppelin Corporation, Akron, Ohio. This corporation is the manufacturer of the rigid United States airship Akron, ZRS-4—destroyed by a storm in April 1933—and the new rigid United States airship Macon, ZRS-5, of United States Naval Aviation, the new nonrigid coastal patrol, 65 miles per hour, United States airship TC-13, of the United States Army Air Corps, and other slower and smaller nonrigid airships. It owns the Zeppelin rights for the United States and controls airship work previously undertaken by the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. Probably all its technical and other material soon becomes known to Germany and other foreign countries. The National City Co. and the National City Bank of New York and the Morgan international financial interests are concerned with the Goodyear-Zeppelin Corporation.

Its activities have led the United States taxpayer into a useless expenditure on gas-filled airships during the years 1930-33 of at least $20,000,000, which has largely benefited the Mellon-controlled Aluminum Co. of America.

This unnecessary expenditure of time, energy, and money is still being caused to mount rapidly. What is even more serious, it detracts not less than to an equal extent from the development of airplanes and warplanes and their engines. It is altogether the wrong way for the United States to recognize foreign or aviation ability.

(c) The Curtiss-Wright Corporation, New York, N.Y., which comprises the following:

First. Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Co., Buffalo, N.Y., airplanes and warplanes.

Second. Keystone Aircraft Corporation, Bristol, Pa., airplanes and warplanes.

Third. Curtiss-Wright Airplane Co., St. Louis, Mo., airplanes.

Fourth. Wright Aeronautical Corporation, Paterson, N.J., Curtiss D-12 (450/500 rated horsepower, water-cooled) and "Conqueror", "Prestone"-cooled, airplane and warplane engines, and Wright "Cyclone" and "Whirlwind" air-cooled radial airplane and warplane engines.

Fifth. Curtiss-Wright Flying Service, flying service.

Sixth. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation, New York, N.Y.

Seventh. Canadian Wright, Ltd., Montreal, Canada.

This group of firms constitutes another Aircraft Trust in the United States, and it is about the size of the United Aircraft & Transport Corporation already referred to. The Curtiss-Wright Corporation is likewise not free to make its own decision on aviation matters. Possibly all its technical and other material also becomes quickly known to foreign countries. In the background the Chase National Bank and the Rockefeller financial interests are concerned with the Curtiss-Wright Corporation. The Bank of the Manhattan Co., the City Bank Farmers Trust Co., the Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co., and the Marine Bank of Buffalo, N.Y., appear more prominently as this corporation's bankers.

The Curtiss-Wright Corporation and the United Aircraft & Transport Corporation between them control the aviation industry of the United States. Their pattern is the same, and they present a united front to any third party, including the Government of the United States. They monopolize the manufacture of airplane and warplane engines in this country. It is the case with both of them, that the last word on whether or not they shall adopt any aviation improvement or invention lies not with their technical executives but with their outside unqualified financial masters. These groups maintain a pool of patents that discourages the offer and adoption of any aviation improvement or invention from without, and deprives their own personnel of real incentive to make any such improvement or invention. Neither of the groups has been responsible for the introduction or adoption of any actual improvements in aircraft or aircraft engines.

They have been and are being caused by the purely financial powers behind them to adhere to the false manufacturing policy in a competitive market of maximum reproduction with minimum improvement. Although the trust builders and stock manipulators of these combines have prevented competition in the design and production of aircraft and aircraft engines in the United States, they have been, naturally, unable even to slow down that of foreign countries; and so, as the appended charts show, their progress has made the United States air defense a negligible factor in the world today.

The only momentous development in aircraft production which any of these financial interests has supported is the already referred to extremely costly and unnecessary one of the gas-filled airships which can be made to call for much greater lump sums of money from the United States Treasury, be more spectacular than any other form of aircraft production as yet, and benefit the Aluminum Co. of America. No foreign nation would tolerate in the path of the development of its air defense any such double-faceted single block of private interests as the United Aircraft & Transport Corporation and the Curtiss-Wright Corporation nor any such conflicting appendage of the financial systems behind either or both of them as the Goodyear-Zeppelin Corporation.

(d) North American Aviation, Inc., New York, N.Y., which comprises the following:

First. Berliner-Joyce Aircraft Corporation, Baltimore, Md., warplanes.

Second. Douglas Aircraft Co., Inc., Santa Monica, Calif., airplanes and warplanes.

Third. Sperry Gyroscope Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y.

Fourth. Ford Instrument Co., Long Island City, N.Y.

Fifth. Transcontinental & Western Air, Inc., New York, N.Y.

Sixth. Eastern Air Transport, Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y.

This smaller aircraft combine is, perforce, subject to the United Aircraft & Transport Corporation and the Curtiss-Wright Corporation because of its dependence upon them for airplane and warplane engines, their ascendancy in the aviation industry of the United States, the market they provide, the great financial powers behind them, and interlocking interests in general.

(e) The leading allegedly individual firms engaged in warplane production in the United States are the following:

First. Bellanca Aircraft Corporation, New Castle, Del.

Second. Consolidated Aircraft Corporation, Buffalo, N.Y.

Third. Glenn L. Martin Co., Baltimore, Md.

Fourth. Great Lakes Aircraft Corporation, Cleveland, Ohio.

Fifth. Grumman Aircraft Engineering Corporation, Valley Stream, Long Island, N.Y.

Sixth. Hall-Aluminum Aircraft Co., Buffalo, N.Y., affiliate of the said Aluminum Co. of America, New York, N.Y., the Mellon-controlled Aluminum Trust.

Now, some of these firms even have been absorbed by the aforesaid North American Aviation Corporation.

These six concerns together merely approximate the size of only the Curtiss-Wright Corporation. They are more or less independent as regards each other and North American Aviation, Inc., but they are, perforce, subject to the United Aircraft & Transport Corporation and the Curtiss-Wright Corporation for the same reasons that North American Aviation, Inc., works hand in hand with these two ascendant combines.

Thus at least all the worth-while limbs of the aviation industry of the United States engaged in producing warplane engines and warplanes are shackled as heavily as possible by the limitations of the private and wholly financial interests of the Wall and Pine Streets area of New York. No foreign country manufacturing warplane engines and warplanes permits any similar restriction of its aviation industry.

These interests have dictated and persisted in the false manufacturing policy of maximum reproduction with minimum improvement in the highly specialized and competitive field of warplane engines and warplanes.

Although this policy is the line of least resistance for purely financial interests to follow, it is treacherously harmful to industry in general and to the manufacture of devices for war in particular. The extent to which it has been caused to prevail in the United States has made this country paramount in reproductive means for obsolete or obsolescent finished products and the least protected against internal price cutting and unemployment. It has been largely responsible for the United States lacking competent air defense.

The private banking and similar financial interests of the United States are the arch priests of this untruthful doctrine, and not this country's comparatively few, efficient, and quite independent manufacturers, such as Mr. Henry Ford. The historical Ford automobile model T, which received throughout the world more nicknames—including "Tin Lizzie" and "Spider Car"—than anything else has ever done, is not an example of maximum reproduction with minimum improvement in a competitive market, even though some 15,000,000 of these automobiles were made and sold without appreciable change for many years up to 1928. It was uniquely constituted for the road surfaces of its heyday, and so it cost less all around to own and operate than any other automobile. It could be made to get anywhere with the least amount of trouble.
